FOREWORD

Some few years ago, when the re-issue of my father's book The Church and the Sacraments was being prepared, the question arose as to whether certain phrases and references which belonged only to the date of its first edition should be deleted, amended, or left unaltered. Those to whose able judgment I submitted the matter decided unanimously in favour of leaving the words as they stood, because they did not affect the main substance. The same question has occurred in the republication of this book, and the same answer has been given. It has been decided that minor anachronisms in no way detract from the value of its progressive thought and the importance of its far-seeing verdicts today. Moreover, as the book is being reproduced photographically, few alterations have been possible. This accounts for such expressions as "the half-penny press," "Mr. Bernard Shaw," "Mr. Keir Hardie," and others.

One passage perhaps needs annotation. It is on page 237, and contains a reference to two Congregational Declarations of Faith. The first of these, dating from 1833, may be found in any Congregational Year Book from 1846 to 1918. It was then discarded, partly because of the paper-shortage of that year, but also partly because it had by then become a historical monument rather than an expression of faith. (It is here reprinted as an appendix). The second, the "Declaration of 1878" (which was unofficial), may be found in substance in Dr. Peel's These Hundred Years, pp. 267, 268.

PREFACE

THE dispute between the spirit and the letter is one that has now burned itself out. As the area of spiritual culture spreads, the worship of the letter retires ; and everywhere now, it may be said, the letter is recognised as the servant of the spirit—to an extent even which often makes it its victim. Not only is the letter made to yield the spirit's larger interpretation, but it may even be erased as an interpolation when it comes into collision with the dogmatism of a ruling idea. Spirit has so conquered all along the line that it is in danger of losing some of the caution and consideration which the victor can never safely discard. While the letter stood in honour there seemed to be something fixed, something in control of spiritual vagrancy. But with its defeat the plea of spirituality may be made to cover anything from inspiration to eccentricity ; and even those who groaned under the tyranny of the letter begin to wonder if it was really worse than to be the sport of stray lights and chance desires. The very 'spirit of Christ' may be used to dissolve His historic existence, and the rich development of revelation to rob it of all finality.

So that the issue which now confronts us, if we are not to keep slaying the slain, is not that of the letter and the spirit; but it is the question where, in the victory of spirit, room is to be found for any control at all, or place for any norm of the spiritual life. Where is our last resort—to Authority or Subjectivity? For the hour civilisation is the victim of subjectivity. Some one said lately that the present age is the most conceited of all ages. At least it is the most full of its own subjectivity. It is true that social trouble or social omen is rousing some fear, and leading people to ask if our subjective liberty and sufficiency is really able to carry itself. But it will take a long time for the misgivings to get as deep as the confidence. And meantime it is an evil time for the seers who face the crowd with a real claim for a veritable and royal Word of the Lord.

To take the familiar case which is suggested by such a phrase—the case of the Bible. What is its place still in Christianity? We certainly cannot treat it as the Reformers did; nor is the warfare round it parallel to that which raged between them and the critics of their day. It cannot be, since the result of the conflict to which I have alluded between the letter and the spirit. The religion of the Reformation can never more be staked on the integrity of the letter of Scripture. Critical science has changed all that. But the question remains all the same. If the letter of Scripture is not final, is there anything in Scripture that is? Is there anything authoritative in the Bible? Is all its interpretation at the mercy of subjective impression? If we have settled the issue between letter and spirit, have we not still to face the question between Word and Spirit? Is there a Word in the Bible for ever to which all the rest of the book is but an aura? Is there in the Bible, still and for ever, a Gospel which is the one guarantee of both certainty and freedom, which is the creator of all freedom and the liberty in all certainty? Has the Bible a finality in it, or is the finality the light which lighteth every man in the world? Is the core of the Bible something definitive and normative for ever, or has the book only a function instrumental and suggestive? Does the soul there find a new creation ; or is the Bible but the means of stimulating and evoking the native resources of the soul at its best ? Is the Christ of the Bible the Redeemer or the Symbol of Humanity ?

It is not a new issue. It is one that is most keenly felt indeed in the Churches that are known as the Free Churches ; but just because they are Churches it is not confined to them, but it is active wherever there is real life in any Church. It ought to be viewed in that great context of a whole Church facing the whole world. Its historic bearings ought to be taken. And the Free Churches especially ought to realise that it is an old legacy for them, and indeed an original entail. For English Dissent did not arise out of the Reformation directly or alone. It arose equally out of the dissenters of the Reformation—the Anabaptists, or however they may be called. And the great issue between the Reformers and the Anabaptists was that which rages so keenly now. It was the issue between a final Word and a free Spirit.

It is the object of these pages, published in the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the creation of Nonconformity by the Act of Uniformity, to trace this issue through this parentage and legacy in the particular case of the community of the author's birth and nurture ; his fatherland, and never his mere platform ; to which his love and service have been paid, always under a ruling allegiance to the great and true Church of Christ whereof it is a part. We are only now beginning to feel the practical meaning of many of our favourite ideas about the Church and the democracy. Our loose phrases are being translated into serious action. And it is well to ask what history has to say upon the subject—our own history in particular. If we treated history right (supposing we knew it) one half of our own problems would vanish, and we should have the key of the other. It may be, also, that the discussion of the large question in the case of a single branch of the Church may have some value for the rest. For the writer's eye is always on the Church Universal, the world of men, and the Saviour of the race.

There never was so much public interest bestowed on Christ as to-day. And it takes two forms in chief—when it assumes public dimensions at all. Christ is regarded as central by all who regard Him in a serious way. But central to what ? One class of mind sees the whole cosmic issue condensed in human history, all history centred in that of the soul, and the grand symbol of the soul and its meaning set forth for our reverence in Christ. Christ is the spiritual centre of a system of things which is spiritual at last or nothing. He is the grand register of man's confidence in his own spiritual destiny and his power to realise it, the chief symbol in a long history which can offer the soul no more than symbols of itself. The symbolism of rites becomes in Him the symbolism of personality. He is the great illustration of truths and ideas which must always shine by their own light, and guarantee to an intuition their own power and permanence.

But another class of mind does not begin with the cosmic problem, even as history, nor with ideas self-luminous and self-sufficient. It begins with the moral problem—of course on a historic scale. It begins with the purpose of God, the Word of God, and man's historic treatment of it. It begins not with the problem of history, but with the revelation in history, not with a problem that revelation may solve, but with a crisis that revelation creates. Its problem is not Adversity but Guilt. It starts with Christ, not as the Symbol of man's aspiration, or the Hero of his resource, but as the Incarnation of God's purpose, or at least the Prophet of God's will. He is the centre of a system of Grace and Sin.

For the one class Christ is the centre of spiritual Humanity; for the other He is the centre of the will and grace of God.

It is the writer's view that the latter is the New Testament Christ, the Christ Eternal.

But it is not as if the two positions faced each other irreconcilably. For the latter includes the former. The dogmatic Christ is the only key to great history, the only warrant of its great destiny. The Christ of revelation alone realises all the great aspiration and destiny of man for which the historic figure to many stands as but symbol. The deed done in Christ alone realises for ever the ideas crystallised in Christ. And He is the centre of any scheme of the world as ideal history only because He is the centre and substance of God's grace to actual sinful history. Christ we cannot evade, either as humanists or as theologians. Nor can we evade His centrality. But we can and must choose whether He is the transfiguration of spiritual

xiv FAITH, FREEDOM, AND THE FUTURE

Humanity, with its eternal destiny still unsure as a great surmise; or whether He is the foregone achievement of that destiny, as the incarnation of God's will of grace for the creation of the New Humanity. Is He man's spiritual ideal projected and cherished, or man's eternal consummation presented and guaranteed? Is He there for our admiration as our highest self, or for our appropriation as God's highest boon?

The conviction in which the writer lives is that it is only the latter view of Christ that gives any permanent value to the former; that Christ is no revelation of a glorious Humanity except as He is the incarnation and agent of God's purpose and act with a Sinful Humanity; that He is no splendid creature, but the New Humanity's holy Creator.

All that is said in this little book is said as one particular application of this supreme text—its illustration in the genesis and genius of Independency viewed as a factor in the great Church and history of the West.

THE WORD AND THE SPIRIT¹

It is in remarkable contrast with the manner of our own time that in the New Testament we find little said about spirituality and much about the Holy Ghost. To-day we seem to have in some cases not so much as heard of a Holy Ghost. Certain Christian types have practically erased that element from their belief, and they do not appear to feel the poorer; whereas spirituality—they seek and ensue it. They set little store by positive belief if they but discern this note. Any truth is true enough which goes with this temper. Believe as you will if only you show the spirit of Christ. The spirit of Christ is not a creative power which leads into all truth but a responsive

¹ May I explain on the threshold what will often recur, that when I speak of the Word here I do not identify it with the Bible, with the Canon. The Word is man's responsive and inspired act of confessing the Gospel as the new creative act of God. It took effect first in the Apostles, and then in the continuous and manifold publication of their message by the Church. And by the Spirit is meant not simply God's presence in the world He made, nor even His presence in History by the historic Son and His posthumous effect, but God's presence in the Church in an Eternal Son and a Holy Spirit Who not only fills the Word but mediates it to the soul.

2 FAITH, FREEDOM, AND THE FUTURE

mood, a frame of mind which cultivates much dogmatic indifference, that is, carelessness of truth. Religion is love and not faith. It is a state, and not an act or a judgment. Hence, as M. Faguet says, it tends to shirk responsibility in action and to court incompetence in belief. To use philosophic language, the subjectivity of the age feels itself comparatively independent of objective reality, and especially of historic. A carelessness of facts, passing into chronic slipshod and habitual unverity, grows up upon the spiritualist mind. Such a case as the Jatho case in Germany shows, by the passionate popularity of a nebulous but devout and amiable man whom his national church has called to order, that, in the mind of many, truth has little to do with a church compared with temperament, and faith little compared with the idealism of an agreeable religiosity. To put it briefly, the Spirit is detached more or less completely from the Word. History becomes as indifferent as doctrine. And we are at one of these gnostic crises that tend continually to recur in the Church's history, where we are not only urged to the conversion of the good, but this regeneration of the regenerate is believed to be effected by a second and inward revelation which does not develop the historic first but supersedes it. The age, the Church, has another comforter than the Jesus who promised

THE WORD AND THE SPIRIT 3

Him by saying, 'I will come unto you' (John xiv. 16; cp. 18). It is on this matter of the relation of the Gospel Word and the Holy Spirit that I would first speak, as the foundation of the history I propose to discuss. It would be a history of the Church of vast value which should be written from this point of view—the progressive contact or collision of the Word and the Spirit.

One cannot write for general reading on these subjects without a haunting sense of some hostility from parts of the public that one would expect rather to interest. There are those who will say, we are ready to hear about history, and about religion in history, but let it be the story of heroes, saints, or martyrs. Both history and religion are personal things. Let us be told, if you will, how great the struggle of ages has been for the simple faith the plain man understands. But why obtrude into the history of such a religion as Christ's the discussion of subtle differences, or make it, as it has too often been made, the arena of theological dispute? When you begin by asking us to distinguish spirituality from the Holy Spirit, and modern subjectivity from the objective religion of the Old Testament, when you try to show the action in history of such refinements as these, are you not doing what the theologians have too often done, and importing scholastic hairsplitting into great affairs ?

One cannot but feel much sympathy with the lay mind in the subtle stage at which religious questions have arrived in an hour like the present. It feels confronted with issues of which no account was taken either in the traditional Biblicism of its upbringing or in the general quality of its education. The old discussions go on in a new language, with a new set of ideas, which bewilder and irritate the mind trained to believe that plain honesty should settle everything, and that the jury should always snub the expert. The attitude in religious matters corresponds here to that in social, where an utterly new temper, outlook, and method on the part of Labour exasperates Capital with a sense of helplessness and nameless peril. One cannot but feel some sympathy for the honest and forthright person who dismisses discussion, calls a plague on both your houses, discards the theologians as faddists, hobbyists, and gratuitous sophisticators, refuses their guidance, and either closes down upon the ultimatum of a text or two, or cherishes a doctrinal Agnosticism on a pathless moor of liberty in a warm mist of charity.

And truly if one threw into the halfpenny daily press discussions on the metaphysics of Godhead,

THE WORD AND THE SPIRIT 5

after the manner in which they pervaded the market-places of the fourth century, one would deserve the charge of gratuitous pedantry. But it is quite another thing that is done when, on the great survey of religious history, people are asked to mark the action of vast experimental principles which can also be condensed into doctrines. We are then dealing not with metaphysical religion but with psychological, with the Spirit's action in experience. To read the history of the Church thus is to read the spiritual autobiography of the race. Now every man who comes to maturity or age with a soul history and the power still to think knows, when he looks back, how different the course of his life has been from what it would have been if it had been made only by the intentions, ambitions, and purposes on which he was most conscious and most keen. He recognises that these plans, these ideals, have been largely thwarted or disappointed, and in any case overruled; and he is what he is in virtue of other guidance than his own, and other powers and ideas than those on which he put his direct and fervent pressure. He either owns the guiding hand of a wise God, or, if he cannot rise so high, he perceives the action of ideas and principles turning him in a long curve, and moulding him with a slow, often unfelt, always irresistible pressure. They permeate life, where his own purposes only bestrode it. And he stands, not where he proposed to do, but where they have brought him—so far at least as that inward man is concerned, which is the truly real, and which he alone sees, however dimly.

It is not otherwise with the race and the history of its soul. 'In the unreasoning progress of the world a wiser Spirit is at work than ours,' a Spirit not simply mightier but wiser, a Spirit whose insight is such that it has sometimes staked the whole human career upon issues which to all men at the time, and not only to the fumbling plain man, seemed a gratuitous refinement of thought, or a quixotic fantasy of conscience. At the most crucial hour of the world's history they all forsook Him and fled. He saw issues to be prime and eternal which to all other men were either not understood or, in so far as they were, seemed forced and over fine. He inverted the perspective of current values.¹ And at this very

'The man is witless of the size, the sum,
The value in proportion of all things,
Or whether it be little or be much.
Discourse to him of prodigious armaments

And of the passing of a mule with gourds—
'Tis one! Then take it on the other side,

With stupor at its very littleness

hour the issues which will really determine the Church's future are those most hidden from the wise and prudent in affairs, even religious affairs; who are irritated that such subtleties should be thrust on their common-sense, full time, and taxed minds. And the resentment is especially keen where religion is held to be a means of comfort or enjoyment, never designed to make our decent pleasures less, or disturb the immunities of nescience.

In the following pages I shall be a good deal occupied with one distinction on which may be said to turn the whole course of the Church's history, and much of its contact with the world. I mean the distinction, and the relation, between the Word and the Spirit, between a religion of fact and a religion of conscience, between Christianity as the religion of the historic final Word and Christianity as the religion of the living and moving Spirit. I shall have to urge how real is the distinction, and how vital the connection, between these in all that pertains to the salvation committed to the Church; and to trace how their approximation or their departure colours whole ages, movements, and churches; how their interaction, so powerful at the very beginning, is equally potent to-day. I wish especially to illustrate these two elements in connection with the origin and nature of English Independency, as leading to modern Democracy, and to show how its greatest life depends on their reality and true relation. And if to any the interest fails in such study, and they prefer the purely biographical, heroic, and impressionist treatment of religious history, I am afraid I must lose attention which I would much rather keep and carry with me. But what we need at the moment is the power to understand the time as the condition of guiding it. It is not arduous but intelligence, not trumpets but maps, an understanding both of our Gospel and our age. To force theology on history is an undertaking which experience shows to be calamitous where it is not absurd. To force it even on the Church, where it is essential, is not wise or prudent. But to show that God theologises in the history of the Church, as He certainly did in its creation, and to show that the history of the world is groaning and travailing with the mystery of those ideas which in the Church are manifest doctrine—that is something very different. To read the ways of God in Christ out of history is a very different thing from inventing them and forcing them into it. And to be led to see that they are there is an essential part of our equipment for the service of any church which exists to effect God's thought and purpose with history, and not merely to realise certain humane ideals.

The new religion of Christianity was not based solely upon the verdict of the spiritual consciousness but on the interaction of two sets of facts: first, the life, miracles, teachings, death, and resurrection of Jesus; and second, the action of the Holy Spirit upon the living generation. The former was valuable only as interpreted and appropriated in the latter. The resurrection of Christ, for instance, as it took place by the Spirit, so had its meaning only by the same Spirit. The world was as alien to the idea of Christ's resurrection as to the spiritual experiences in its wake. But the Christian certainty rested on the indwelling of the same eternal Spirit by Whom Christ offered Himself and was raised from the dead.

But the higher we rise in the scale of truth so much the more subtle and seductive become the possibilities of error, and the more serious error becomes, not, perhaps, for the individual, but for the Church and its future. And here was a danger—the danger of the Spirit's becoming detached from the Word, and the Church's experience escaping from its creative facts. This soon took place in Gnosticism, against whose beginnings the whole of the later part of the New Testament is a protest. And the first step in the process was the allegorising of the facts, and their employment for homiletic rather than evangelical use. They were treated as symbols, and not as creative acts of God. They became indifferent as creative facts, and valuable only as edifying suggestions, or as expressions of spiritual experiences which, however much they owed to the facts as stimuli, could, once they were started, go on without them. The historic fact became subordinated to the spiritual experience as its mere parable or its suggestion, and finally it was denied and treated as lumber.

This is a course which has been frequently repeated in one form or another in the Church's history; and, in one form or another, it has always to be arrested, and to be forced back on the facts—though never without being overruled for gain in the long-run both to the Word and the Spirit.

We have therefore in the New Testament, at the very beginning of the Church, the two elements of the Word and the Spirit, evangelism and spiritualism, the historic and the pneumatic. Both were quite necessary for the missionary action of the Church, as we see from Peter's evangelical interpretation of the tongues in Acts ii. And when John xvi. 18 says of the Spirit, 'He shall not speak of Himself, but whatsoever He shall hear that shall He speak,' we have the same inseparable connection expressed in the form of a justification of the fourth Gospel in relation to the Synoptics. The ministry of the Spirit was not to supersede the historic salvation, and yet it was to do more than merely transmit it. It was to be at once its continuity, its amplification, and its individualisation—all three. The Holy Spirit was never to be detached from the fontal Word. Nothing is more certain than this in the New Testament. Any manual of New Testament theology will illustrate textually the fact that Word and Spirit are, if not identical, yet inseparable aspects of one power and one action. Things done in one place by the Word—things like conversion or regeneration—are done in another by the Spirit.

We can further mark the process by which the Church was led, from speaking of the unique thing in Christ as the Spirit which moved the prophets, to recognising it as distinct from that by a difference more than gradual. It was not merely the same Spirit acting in another way—it was now something more intimately divine, the Holy Spirit. The Spirit visited the prophets, they had the Spirit; but Christ, the living Word, was identified with Him, with not only the power but the holiness of God. When Paul in Romans i. 4 says that Christ rose by the spirit of holiness, the meaning of holiness there is not merely ethical. For in the Old Testament the Holy Spirit of God is more than that, and means the majesty and sublimity and Godhead of a God that transcends even the ethical world. The spirit of holiness which rose in Christ was the supernatural element which placed Him in the eternal majesty of God, and set Him as far above prophets or kings as these were above nature. We are here dealing not with the spirit of the Creator uniquely pervading the creation, nor only with the unique presence of God in human history, selecting a nation or inspiring its prophets, or living in a Son, but with His unique and individual action in the Church of the Son's regenerates—with the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is associated in the most close and exclusive way with the act of the Son, the action of the Word, and the existence of a Church of new souls. It is given by Christ as

His greatest gift; therefore it was the fruit of His greatest act and consummation. It has its source in the Cross, and its first action in the Resurrection and its Word. Its prime action therefore is in its nature miraculous; it is not to ethicise, not to sanctify, but first to regenerate, by organising men into Christ's new creation. So that it is not one of Christ's gifts, as the Gospel is not, but the complete and effective gift of Christ Himself, as the Saviour of the world brought home to the individual in the communion of God and the community of a Church. So that, also, we cannot continue to speak of the Spirit as it, but must go on to speak of Him, as He enters more deeply the personal life.

The Holy Spirit is thus inseparable from this work of Christ and from the word of it in the apostolic preaching which is crystallised in the Bible. It is certainly not, in the New Testament, the Christlike spirit, meaning thereby a particular type of religious subjectivity, a specific frame of mind. In the New Testament the Holy Spirit, the Lord the Spirit, is an objective power, working, before all sanctification, a new creation, and effecting it from the focal point of the Cross and Resurrection, and the thing done there once for all. It is not the spirit of discipleship but of regeneration by that Word. The suggestion is not approaching an ideal but crossing a Rubicon. And it creates not a fraternity but a Church. God's action in the Spirit is thus not an independent action alongside the Word, or following it and crowning it. It is not as if a first act of God gave historical information in the general Word, and a second fructified it for particular experience. We have not two causalities. Such an idea cuts the certainty from faith in the Word. It lands us in an idea of absolute predestination, apart from the Gospel, on the one hand, or in a false and unhistoric mysticism on the other. There is an inner and organic connection between the Word and the Spirit. It is not partnership, it is wedlock, not co-operation but polarity. For the purposes of salvation the Spirit acts reciprocally in, with, and through the Word, as in the natural realm God does through nature. The Holy Spirit does not effect a direct contact of God as the spiritual power with man's inner nature, as if it switched on the inner light. That makes the work of Christ either superfluous or no different in kind from the work of all other men in rousing and kindling nature. And it could not then be the supreme and distinguishing act of God's love, as it is so constantly called in the New Testament (John iii. 16, Romans viii. 32). Revelation would then be but illumination, and not redemption; it would flood us and submerge, rather than lift and save. The response would be but visionist and not moral, it would be but insight not committal, knowledge not action, piety not faith, states and feelings and not will, turning on a truth we perceive rather than a reality we enter. The Word is the organ of the Holy Spirit for the purposes of salvation into holiness. And yet not in the sense that the Spirit inspired the Word and then left it to act for itself, as the Deists used to think God made the world, and retired from it, and left it to run. The Holy Spirit which inspired the universal Word is not only immanent in it always as the Creator Spirit is in universal nature, but also present to the soul every time the Word comes home. The ministry of the Word is the chief agency of the Holy Ghost, and the chief function of the Church; whose business is not simply publication of a truth but confession of an experience—the experience of the indwelling Spirit as its life. It is the Holy Spirit that makes the Word to be revelation; it is the Word that makes revelation historic and concrete. It is historic not only in the sense of being actual, but in the sense of being concrete with history, solidary with the organic whole of historic affairs, and not merely pointed for illuminate individuals, or diffused in mystic humanity. The action of the Spirit through the historic Word is integral to God's whole action on the race. There is no action of God on man which is out of relation to his central, final, and saving action in Christ by the power of the Holy Ghost. Light from God comes indeed to man without the historic mediation of Christ. But it is all from the God and Father of Christ. And in Christ alone is the power of God unto the race's salvation, and so to its final illumination.

In contrast with all this is the spiritualist position. Its chief features are, first, its attempt at direct contact with God and its rejection of the idea of mediation, even by Christ; second, its claim to have a new knowledge of God, a real addition to historic revelation, to have a revelation which is not a deeper realisation of the old but a new communication; and, third, a great lack of clearness, steadiness, and certainty beyond the moment. It seeks the final and certain revelation of God in an inner witness He bears of Himself in men's souls. This alone gives freedom from all external authority, including that of the historic past and its figures. This alone seems direct intercourse with God, and to its bar Christ Himself must be brought. There is by comparison no external and historic Word, none with finality, none within which all personal illumination in spiritual things moves but as its explication. Historical revelation is but initial preparation. It is an early stage, substantially outgrown. We do not meet God in a historic Christ made present by the Spirit, but in a spirit once symbolised in the historic Christ. The only locus of revelation is the individual experience (Christ being but a particular case of it); whose culmination is in passive impressions, convictions, perceptions, visions, ecstasies, or suchlike forms of direct illumination by the inner light or 'the ideal Christ.' Revelation means only direct communication by God to individuals in moments of exaltation or insight which may supersede history. The spirit becomes a second, and higher, and ultimate revelation, whether received as a supernatural action, or taken as the natural spirituality of man at his best. Such is natural as distinct from Christian mysticism, whether enthusiastic or speculative.

There are in the New Testament no more than points of attachment for such a view; but they seemed to give footing to movements in Church history which discarded the finality and sufficiency of the Word—movements like Montanism, Gnosticism, Mysticism, and Anabaptism. Repressed by the Reformation the tendency flamed up again in Pietism. And it was reinforced by speculative philosophy, which revived the old Gnosticism by its doctrine of the self-explication of the infinite Spirit overruling all historic testimony, and emerging to a progressive self-realisation in the phenomena of history and the soul. The career of spiritualism, thus cut off from historic finality, ends in Rationalism (as our own day freely shows), wherein the natural knowledge of God is made the key to the Gospel, instead of the Gospel becoming the key to it.

Of course such spiritualisms have their place and use. Negatively they have been provoked as protests by the hardening up of religious truth, by the mere theologising of the Word of God, and its precipitation into a system with its appeal to the understanding. And their protest has been of great value, especially for individuals. But they cannot be permanent. And they cannot found or sustain a society, a church. They rest too much upon impressions, temperamental, momentary, and open to challenge in a more sober light. They do not come for good, like a historic revelation spiritually discerned. An imagined Christ does not stay like a historic who is also eternal. They breed a religion moodish rather than personal, whereas in the Gospel we have personal communion with Christ in all life's functions, and not simply in its mystic moments. The speculative substitution even of an immanent Logos-Christ for the historic, or for the mystic, does not give a fixed point of certainty for the generations, any more than the more exalted moments do for the individual. No spiritualism can give us a fixed point for practical certainty if it finds the Word of the historic Gospel to be a limitation, instead of that one sacrament, release, and opening of all things which it is for faith.

In the New Testament then we have two orders, two factors, of spiritual power working together, which have also continued to interact through the whole course of the Church's history, and have moulded it according to the predominance of each. They are the Word and the Spirit, the Bible and the Church, the historic element and the pneumatic, evangelism and spiritualism. If we contrast them, the one turns on the historic Word in its finality and normality from the past, the other on the co-ordination with it of a present life and experience. The one is concerned with a mighty record, the other with a mighty power and life. The one furnishes the element of fixity and continuity, the other of movement and variety. The one, the Word, like a thunder sound, is communal to the whole Church, the other, like a voice, is specialised for the soul. The one is apostolic, in that it is the experimental witness once for all of men with a unique charge from Christ; the other is prophetic, in being the witness of souls who have simply a vivid spiritual experience, but not necessarily that experience, the experience of the apostolic fact. The one produces regenerates by the gift of grace, the other tends to produce illuminates, charismatics, or even eccentrics, with special gifts that need the Word's control. The one makes believers, the other saints or adepts. The one is deliberate, ordered, weighty, and sure, the other enthusiastic, rhapsodic, or even orgiastic; the one a church, the other a synagogue of the Libertines. The one works by the intuition of the fact, the other by the intuition of the soul. The one made the base of the Church, the other deployed it. The young Church had early to secure its base of fact against a free spirituality more dangerous than sheer paganism; and it did so in the rule of faith, in creed, canon, and episcopate, which were its stay in an age swept by pneumatic excitement both within the Church and without. And the Church, organised on this base, though it did sometimes quell the pneumatic enthusiasm, in the main harnessed it for its work in the world, as the great spiritual organiser, Paul, did with his Corinthians and their tongues (1 Cor. xiv.). It was a control that was met with much recalcitrance, even when the authority was that of an apostle, as we see from Eph. iv. 14, where he has not pagans but Christians in his eye. And had the authority of the apostles with their creative facts failed, the young Church would have dissolved in spiritual anarchy and futility. But in deploying the spiritual resources of the Church this control was not wanting.

A sketch of Church history, written from this point of view by the skilled pen of a competent scholar with the seeing eye and the understanding heart, would be a great service to the Christian public to-day. The point of view I mean is the contact, the friction, the reciprocity of the Word and the Spirit, of the official and the evangelical, of the institutional and the enthusiastic, of tradition and spontaneity; and of these not in a banal antithesis of death and life, but as living and powerful on both sides. Nothing would make it so clear how little novelty there is in much modernism; how venerable the new theologies are; how much respect their antiquity deserves; how perennial is their principle, how varied its form; how the Gospel in the first few centuries broke the back of that principle for good; how its fragments enriched the Gospel whose life it threatened by its integrity; what a tonic the Gnostic or critical principle may be on the one hand, or the mystic on the other, to a sound historical constitution to which it would be fatal as a life; how richly speculation may exploit a faith it cannot create; how it may serve and adorn in harness a church which it would wreck if it drove.

And the most interesting chapter, perhaps, of such a book would show us the play, within even the first century and the New Testament, of almost every principle or idea that distracts or threatens a church of the Gospel to-day. Apostolic Christianity did not make itself good in a mental vacuum, but it was secured in direct conflict with the principle of every heresy that has threatened its life from then till now. Protestantism has perhaps been unduly engrossed by the struggle of St. Paul with Judaism; and it is but awaking to the significance of other and more pagan conflicts, which he began by facing in Thessalonians and Corinthians, which returned to engage his later years, which engrossed St. John, so that it is only by their knowledge that we can understand his Epistles, and which in the temporary retreat of Paulinism (then as now) held the field.

Such a chapter would have to point out that even in the New Testament we can see many members of the Church parting from it, not in a frank relapse to the world, but in the foundation of rival churches with the same Christian name but another liberty than Christ's. We can see men who were brought in by the apostolic preaching starting to missionise on their own account with fresh revelatory capital, founding on visionary experiences, outgrowing the Word in what they held to be the power of the Spirit, holding themselves to be vessels of the Spirit more than the antiquated apostles were, cultivating a more rapt and mystic religion, and construing Christianity on the more liberal creed of gnosis rather than grace, of thought rather than faith, of intuition rather than history. They impressed people by a magnetism, a facility, and a confidence which the apostles, much humbled and scarcely saved, did not command. They offered a liberty very different from that wherewith Christ made apostles free. To their ardours, at their height, everything was lawful; and therefore sin was mostly a fiction. It could certainly be made too much of. They lowered and practically erased the fence between the Church and the age, and adjusted the Cross with so much ingenuity to the culture and comfort of the hour that it also was erased from their gospel. This brought them into a contrast with the faithful Church which rose to antagonism; and love of the household of faith was changed to hate for official Christianity and a gospel to the conscience. The historic Jesus was submerged or evaporated in the atmosphere of the Spirit. Or He became a mere symbol of God, with a fleeting significance as history outgrew Him, with no resurrection, no reality, and no return. His cross became but a symbol of cosmic or spiritual process. The churches of St. Paul and St. John were troubled with libertinism, with the visionism of people who claimed superior enlightenment as pneumatics and prophets, with Gnosticism which served up the Gospel as rational truth dressed with sentimental jelly, and treated the resurrection of Christ either as a myth they had outgrown or as an ideal process in whose midst they all were.

And there were many who fell in with the ways of pagan society, only bringing to them a certain religious aspiration and refinement which even paganism could not command. Throughout it all the death of Christ was pushed into a corner, like an embarrassing episode of which the less said the better. And throughout all also ran one philosophic principle as coherent at bottom as the unity of the jealous God and Gospel it opposed. Insight took the place of faith and claimed a higher measure of the Spirit, a purer knowledge of God and His wisdom. It tended to banish repentance from its experience, as spiritual culture always does when it claims to outgrow evangelical faith. The fear of God dropped to a crude and inferior stage of religion. The idea of discipline vanished from church life; and an extravagant idea of personal liberty, imported from the natural democracy, took the first place, vacated by the obedience of faith. They readily formed groups which were first irritant within the Church and then rivals without. Where they did not move towards libertinage they took to the other extreme of ascetic and gratuitous abstinence. Emancipation took the place of redemption, and revolution of regeneration.

These tendencies spread through the more cultivated churches of Asia Minor, carried by wandering evangelists of much spiritual claim, who urged the distinction of the earthly Jesus and the heavenly Christ, and sought by their culture of a spiritual Christ to deliver the soul from the bondage of a historic Saviour. The keen theological conflict of the next century or two only carried the same issues into a larger field; and the Athanasian victory, which saved Christianity for Europe and Europe for the future, was at bottom no more than a repetition, on the scale of a great church, of the apostolic victory gained on the New Testament area for all time.

Certainly the duty and the blessing of each age is to handle the perennial opponent of the Gospel in the form in which the age presents it. We have both to surmount and to utilise the Gnosticism of to-day as truly as the Church of the first centuries did with the form that faced it. But it is very much gained for the quietness and confidence of our strength to know that it is no strange trial of faith that befalls us, that it is in principle the same antagonist still, with the same signature of defeat upon him, and the same possibilities in him to be our mighty helper when he has been reduced to the service of a faith he once thought to command. It is easy for the untaught to think that the challenge of to-day belongs to a departure of the twentieth century which at last is to make all things new. And for public and social freedom how true it often is, and how hopeful. And for the science of our faith and Gospel it has also much that is true and useful in it. But for the fact and faith of the Gospel it is not true. And a due knowledge of the past would teach us how little it is true. And it would give us to feel that we are in a host which is always but following up, through a country deeply disaffected, a victory which has been won from a historic beginning, and has never to be gained again.

We have seen that the function of the Spirit in the Church was not simply to transmit the Word but to develop it. And Newman's question soon arose: How far might this go? How shall we know what is development and what degeneration? What is the note of a true tradition? How are we to distinguish the evolution of the Gospel fact from the evolution of a mere spiritual idea, the realisation of the old from the revelation of a new? How can we tell what is the development of the old revelation and what is the invasion of new? Does the Spirit really extend the region of revelation, or only continue, enrich, and individualise the original, sole, and compendious revelation? Is there a second and superior revelation of the Spirit which makes the first old?

It was largely to meet this difficulty that both the belief and life of the Church became more organised, and a canonical base was provided for the Church in the Bible, where the present Spirit coincided with a living Word. But control has been hard to fix; and the enthusiasm of a spiritualism beyond or without the Word has broken out vehemently from time to time, as the Church overdid its function and sterilised the Word. It made Gnosticism, Montanism, Mysticism, Anabaptism, and, to a certain extent, the tradition of the Roman Church.

Spiritualism was either natural or supernatural. It either fell back, with a Logos-idea, on the rational spirit native to man at his best, inbreathed by the Creator at the first, and unspoiled at the centre by sorrow or sin, on a rational spirituality, which made the speculative idealism of the Gnostic pneumatics, Or, with the more apostolic pneumatics, it believed in a supernatural invasion of that human nature by the special action of God, by the Holy Ghost—only a Holy Ghost that found a historic revelation to gall it by its limitations, and that could only surmount them by superseding such a historic revelation, and treating it with the utmost freedom. This supernatural spiritualism, again, took two forms. One was represented by the tradition which the Roman Church made parallel to the Bible, rising outside apostolic sources, due to the visions or the judgment of individual saints or companies, and sometimes standing above the apostolic Bible, and continually tending to do so. Its true nature was expressed when Pio Nono said, 'I am tradition.' And its tendency is farther illustrated by the contrasted behaviour of Luther and of Loyola when each was in spiritual despair at the crisis of his life. Luther, in a true apostolic succession, turned to the Bible, Loyola betook himself to visions and such direct dealings with the spiritual world. The one found refuge in the Word with the Spirit, the other in the Spirit without the Word.¹ The other form of supernatural spiritualism is represented by Montanism and Anabaptism, and especially the latter, where the immediate inspiration took the reins from the historic Gospel, went round the Reformation and behind it, and found its point of attachment in the Roman Mysticism which so attracted Luther at first, but from which he clearly emerged. Rome, Anabaptism, Modernism are all in one strain.

Its note is perpetual revelation, in the same sense in which the Bible contains revelation; and revelation under individual conditions which tend to be ecstatic, and irresponsible to either the written or preached word. It dwells upon the prolongation of Christ rather than His appropriation. It lives in communities with an ethical rigour and an ascetic simplicity, which is compounded for by unlimited spiritual licence in the way either of belief, or of feeling, or of prophecy. For the Reformation, especially, in both its Swiss and German forms, it made danger and damage which threatened to undo the Gospel and restore the kingdom to Rome. We shall see in Independency how it affected the Reformation in its English form.

It has been said with much truth that in the relation of Word and Spirit Spiritualism recognises only the divine factor in salvation, Rationalism only the human. Calvinism clearly distinguishes, and even disjoins, them (though it always associates them), and Lutheranism puts them in an organic unity of constant mutual immanence and interaction. And here, perhaps, the Lutheran side is deeper and nearer the truth. The action of the Spirit is immediate to the soul yet not unmediated by the Word. The Spirit when He had set the Word down in history did not abdicate for it and its rich posthumous effects. He is always there, personally with and over it. But in bringing it to our experience He does not come to it from the outside, nor simply work alongside. He is immanent always to the Word (for this Word is a perpetual act); he imbues it, flushes it, brings it, carries it home from within for the individual soul. And this not mechanically, by merely making us acquainted with the Word, and not dynamically, by the inspiration throbbing in the Word alone, as if it were driven, like a rocket, with its own burning; but by a presence and action on each soul as direct as in the old Word, as intimate in the sinner as in the Gospel that saves him. We are raised from our death of sin not simply by the preaching of Christ's resurrection, but by the same action of the same Spirit that raised Christ from the dead. We are regenerate by the resurrection of Jesus Christ (1 Peter i. 3). The Gospel is always the Spirit in action, not from afar, not from an old inspired past which never loses its force, but also from the direct present using that timeless past. It is one effect in us that is achieved vitally by the present Spirit, and instrumentally by the historic Word. It is the living matter and content of the ageless Word that is brought livingly home to us by the personality of the Spirit. Each of the two is necessary to the one effect of conversion and regeneration. We must not part the outer and the inner Word, the past and the present, the Gospel and the Spirit. This supernature, as Goethe said of Nature, hat weder Kern noch Schale; it has neither husk nor kernel; all is kernel and all is husk. The Word or Gospel, like the Spirit, is the holy power of God acting unto salvation. More than the inspiration of the Word is required for salvation; the regeneration by the Spirit is required, which seizes and individualises for us the truest and highest inspiration, renovates it always, and keeps it as near, fresh, and powerful as life. Even inspiration dies into the light of common day unless there be a constant creative power that works it into life's regeneration.¹ Inspiration visits and impresses us with fresh light or heat, but the Spirit regenerates us and stays as new life. The power of conversion is not locked up in the Bible; the Holy Spirit is always its direct and last cause. But the Word is His medium; yet 'not as a hammer is in a hand but as a hand is in the body.' Salvation is not the effect of genius. We do not do full

¹ Again Goethe, with the familiar note that so often drops the greatest truth in a causerie :—

'Ardours, like oysters, are excellent food,
But they must be fresh if they are to be good.
You cannot bottle inspiration
Or open, like sardines, on occasion.'

justice to the Bible in magnifying its inspiration alone. Its unique value is not to kindle but to create, not to kindle elation but to create life; not that it is a potent deposit of the Spirit in the past, but His creative agent always. The virtue that goes out of the Bible does not get access to the will (however it impress sensibility) till the same personal Spirit which acted directly in inspiring the Bible act directly also through the Bible on the will.

It is useful at this point to stop for a moment to press the value of this distinction between impression and regeneration, which for the religious public is mainly lost. It is a distinction which becomes very practical in the matter of preaching; inasmuch as the preaching characteristic of our day, fine as it may be, is without due power because it is impressionist rather than regenerative. It is the servant of religious culture rather than the source of new life. The connection of this with the Church's frame of mind in regard to the Holy Ghost need not be obscure.

If we are acted on only by the content of a Bible inspired by the Holy Ghost and left to produce its effect accordingly, one might almost say naturally, that is but impression. The book is then the grand classic of religious experience, extraordinarily effective whether as stirring, imposing, or quietive; but it is no such sacramental and creative thing as the Church has found it to be. But if the inspired Word is not merely left to itself and to the impression calculated to be produced by its inspired content, if it is not left, like a mechanical creation, to act of itself, to work off its fuel, to produce the effects bottled up in it, and evolve the results involved by its Author; if the Holy Spirit bring the living content of the old inspiration, by His living, personal, and present ministrations, into saving contact, contact creative and not only impulsive, with each living soul, that is much more than impression, that is regeneration. And it is a power that is associated with this book alone. The old Gospel, preached with spirit, makes an impression; when preached with the Holy Spirit it makes regeneration. Preached religiously, with a due sense and sympathy of the matter involved in the text, it is impressive; preached evangelically, by a regenerate agent of the present Holy Spirit, it creates anew. Sermons preached by a lover and venerator of Jesus can impress us for long; but they do not regenerate till the Word is taken out of the preacher's lips and spoken by a present Spirit, through whom he is far more than Christ's lover, lyrist, or hierophant. The Christian preacher is not a hierophant but an apostle. The Spirit then acts directly through the medium of the Word—which way of putting it must be true because it is a paradox, and such exasperating paradoxes are the native language of the Spirit to Faith, which the plain and natural man cannot receive. For religion is natural and simple, but faith is not. The sun acts directly and most powerfully upon us through the medium of a lens; it could not thus act through a book. And so, it has been said, the Bible is more than a book, 'a storied window richly dight,' and it partakes of something which gives it rather the effect of a spiritual lens. It is this present individualising action of the Spirit that gives the Bible its unique place after all the discounts allowed to criticism, and makes it canonical for us in respect of the Gospel. It is this that makes it equally the book of every age and stage. We are enlarged by Shakespeare, but on the Bible we live. Shakespeare is in our study, but the Bible is by our deathbed.

The true inspiration of the Bible thus comes home only to regenerate men. The inspiration of genius is one thing, and it can make an indelible impression upon us; but the inspiration of the Holy Ghost is a thing quite other; and when that finds us it does not simply leave us different, it leaves us changed. Here is a μετάβασις εἰς ἄλλο γένος. We are loved with the same love with which the Father loves the Son, we are incorporated into the inner life of God. We are loved not as His children but as members of his Son. By Him God is not impressed on us so much as we are engrafted into God. And we might express the gain and the loss in current preaching by saying that it was more confidential in its note with men than intimate in its communion with God.

The opportunity may perhaps be taken here to point out that in this connection religion acts in three ways, which ascend, but which do not exclude each other.

1. As an impression. This is the Greek aspect of it. It is cosmological. It is our response to the effect of the world of nature or man upon us, in the shape of fear, wonder, reverence, or dependence. It represents the view of religion in such an anthropology as Wundt's.

2. As a satisfaction; as meeting the needs of the soul, especially for life and salvation, as giving us what is not there or consummating what is, as fulfilling aspiration, or explaining and realising humanity. It makes religion the greatest of cultures, and God the greatest asset of humanity. This is the psychological aspect of religion. It is associated with such names as Augustine, Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and the whole system of value-judgments which he has made so effective.

3. As regeneration; conveying not more life but a new life, by a new creation through a real conversion. This is theological. And whereas the second was anthropocentric this is theocentric. The satisfaction involved is first and foremost the satisfaction of God. God does not come to Himself in man, but man does come to himself in God. Our peace is in the fulfilment of His holy will. And the first charge upon the Reconciler of men is that He should do justice to a reconciled God.

The significance of these three complementary aspects of religion comes home to us most clearly when we cease to be occupied with religion and speak more plainly of Christ, and of the predominant aspect in which He is put to the world. It makes a great difference to the Church and its preaching whether we think of Him chiefly according to the impression He makes upon us as the symbol and glory of spiritual nature in the human soul; or whether we think of Him as the grand provision made by God for the satisfaction and realisation of Humanity and its ideals; or whether Humanity turn from its spiritual egoism and self-absorption and think of Christ as the eternal means whereby God did historic justice to His holy and loving name from amid the lost impotence of man and his historic guilt. It must make a great difference to the Church and its preaching whether Christ is offered as the unique source of religious impressions through sermons to a sensitive audience by men of more or less genius in that line; or whether He is offered as the fulfilment of human need and aspiration, which, and not worshipful obedience, are regarded as matters of first moment, and to which therefore Christ must be adjusted; or whether, beyond all else, He stands for us before God, and has for His supreme charge in our name and stead to glorify His holy name in a perfect and final obedience. There is a great difference between an impressive word, an edifying, and a sacramental; between preaching that makes a mark, that makes a movement, and makes a man; between affecting people, enhancing them, and regenerating them. It will make all the difference to our preaching, in many subtle ways, whether its central idea and ruling note is that of a Christ who does justice to God or to man, who saves God's holiness first or man's soul (in so far as inseparables can be thought apart). It must make much difference whether we think that in the crisis and completion of His life in death Christ was preoccupied with what He was offering to God, or with what He was doing for man. It must make much difference whether the Church presents Christ pre-eminently as spiritual prophet, beneficent king, or atoning priest. We have had the experience for two generations of a preaching which has ignored the idea of satisfaction to God for the effectuation of man through God, and which has neglected God's freedom in grace for man's freedom in faith. In the preacher's aim impression has taken the place of regeneration, spiritualisation of conversion. And it is not hard to measure the effect, in the popularity of the preacher and depopulation of the Church, in the bustle of the Church and its loss of influence for the ethicising or guiding of those public forces which have become so formidable in our social life. We shall never get permanent justice done to human nature till we are concerned before that about having justice done to God. So far the religion of the matter, in Christianity at least, waits on its theology.

There is another thing I will stop to point out here as I have touched the Lutheran and Calvinistic difference in this matter, because we shall have frequent occasion to notice it later. We shall notice that when spiritualism, in the shape of Anabaptism, did get hold of the Reformation it was the Calvinistic side of it that it got, especially in Independency. The explanation of that is not simply the Anabaptists' bitter memory of the Lutheran dragonnades. There is in it something which is more ad rem. And it is bound up with the distinctively Calvinist view of the connection between Word and Spirit as one of association however invariable (for God does not give a new revelation). Calvin keeps distinct, though inseparable, the effect of the inspired Word and the complementary action of the Spirit as really decisive, truly inward, and heart-opening. The latter is something added to the former rather than produced by it. The Word and the Spirit are two causalities, so far as psychological action goes, though they continually refer to each other. They are never detached, one is never left behind, in the way spiritualism says. Christianity is not spirituality apart from evangelical faith in the facts. For Calvin, truly, the sending of the Spirit was not a second act of God besides the sending of Christ; but the Spirit's action on the heart was still an action independent of His action in inspiring the Word, which it is doubtful if Calvin regarded as even the instrument of the Spirit, however much its coadjutor.¹ It is clear that such a view as Calvin's gives a footing to spiritualistic detachment, to a second revelation, and finally rationalism, which is not offered by the Lutheran view, where the Spirit is more organic and immanent to the Word, and such Word is in the most direct connection with faith.

For Lutheranism Revelation is Redemption; the Word by the Spirit produces the saving faith, and apart from the saving act behind the Word in all its organic compass there is no revelation in the strict, certain, and saving sense. The supernatural action of the Spirit is involved, but not exhausted, in the psychological effect of the Word. Luther laid much stress on the Word as the great sacrament. For spiritualism the Spirit brings new revelation of God's will; for Lutheranism it brings only new realisation of God's one all-inclusive will in the new creation. 'How shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?' The Word of God is in the Bible on its way to the soul. And we are made Christians not by chance spiritual insights or visitations, not by piety any more than by conduct, not by anything temperamental or subjective, but by trust in the Holy Spirit's Word of our regeneration in Jesus Christ.

It is very easy to criticise, and even to ridicule, the excesses of the spiritualistic temper when it escapes from the control of the historic Word and the norm of its revelation. These we must admit, with a frankness secure in the supremacy for us of the Word. Extravagances on that side leap into the eye. But those of the other side do not quickly offend the general or the social mind. On the spiritualist side they are extravagances of individuals often, which easily startle a community, and may be salutary because they do, however fatal if they had their way; on the other side the excess affects the whole community itself, and comes to seem a part of its healthy order and security. The public is much more easily shocked by individual or sectarian heresies than by the hardening of an extreme orthodoxy which settles down upon the whole body and becomes part of the ritual of thought and life. The freaks ascribed to the Spirit arrest far more attention than the frost which settles on the Word. Consequently both the Church and the State have been more prompt to denounce and despise the various spiritualisms than to wake from their own snow-sleep, and realise the spiritual resources of their own historic Gospel. In Germany, the legatee of the Reformation Word, there seems to be no charge that discredits more in Church circles, and especially theological circles, than Methodismus. It may be a relic of the fight for its life which the Reformation had with enthusiasm in the case of the Anabaptists. But it is also a Nemesis. Germany has never got over the Reformers' dragonnade of the Anabaptists any more than France has got over the Bartholomew. Each killed what here became Free Churchism, with its blessing to our public peace and order, by our constitutional revolutions. No doubt spiritualism, left to itself, does mean the dissolution of the Churches and of Christianity. But then evangelism left to itself, the mere re-echo of the Word without the vitality of the Spirit, is no less fatal. If the one pulverise the Church the other petrifies it. And the more firmly we are fixed in the historic and continuous Word, the more we are exalted by the Spirit's action and insight through it, so much the more are we free and bound to recognise the service done the Church from without by the spiritualist protests and inroads. The more we deplore the correct orthodoxy of the eighteenth century, the more thankful we are for the Quakers; even as when we discover the perils of the inward light, we are grateful for the quickening of the idea of Church, Word, and Sacrament which marked the nineteenth century, and gave the inwardness a footing without freezing its feet to the rock. And certainly the inwardness of a supernatural spiritualism like the Quakers, with all its risk, is a much more valuable thing for the soul than the bald and critical rationalism which formed the other protest against the hard orthodoxy of their period. Gnosticism had to be conquered by the early Church and its Word, but the victor gained immensely from the vanquished. Montanism had also for the Church's life to be overcome, but it left a beneficent mark on that life. Mysticism, which so readily drifts into a pantheistic religiosity for the lack of a historic anchor, we all owe to-day has been of duly priceless service to the depth and beauty of piety when taken in hand. And even a form of spiritualism so wild and bloody as Anabaptism, so solvent of both order and belief, has become, when it was stripped of its ore and moulded in fire, the second great factor of that Independency which has made the modern world. This is a case which the following pages must try to make good.

LECTURE II

ANABAPTISM AND THE REFORMATION—THE SOCIAL SIDE

WHEN we say, as we usually say, that Independency was the Reformation coming to its true self, we may easily fall into a mistake which makes its history somewhat obscure and leaves much to be explained. It is not clear, for instance, why Luther's first instincts that way came to nothing. Certainly Independency was a true legatee of the Reformation; and it was so in two directions—in the direction of personal religion and in the direction of public freedom, in freedom of soul and freedom of conscience. Especially did it bring to light and to practice principles which the Reformers themselves failed to realise in their public effects. Not one of the leaders surmised, for instance, that in the predestination which was such a conviction to them lay the root of modern democracy. Indeed the fact still seems a paradox to most of ourselves. They had much to say of a double predestination, but it was a double predestination in another sense than theirs—it meant, under the sovereignty of God,

ANABAPTISM AND REFORMATION 45

not only the foregone salvation of the soul but the predestined sovereignty of the people. So that, though Independency did develop the Reformation, that is only true with two modifications, or rather expansions. It did most to develop something else. First, it was not the Lutheran Reformation it developed but the Calvinistic, not the reformation of prince and peasant, squire and vassal, but of the free burgher and craftsman, or the yeoman. It was the civic rather than the agrarian side of the Reformation it took up on the whole. Yet, second, it gave distinctive effect to what was but a collateral of the Reformation, though a factor of the Reformation age—the radical Co-Reformation, the persecuted and despised movement of the peasants and Anabaptists.

How the peasants and the Anabaptists drew together in Germany is well known. The old socialist movement of the peasants not only took advantage of the Reformation to spring to new life with the reopened Bible, but it joined with a revival of the old spiritualistic mysticism where the Spirit took the control from the Word. These together would have wrecked the Reformation had the Reformation not wrecked them—truly under circumstances of barbaric cruelty which still have their Nemesis in the German Church, but also under an inevitable necessity, even if there had been no cruelty beyond what must have gone with any civil war in such days. Had the Protestant princes not put down the peasants Rome would have recovered all she had lost. Not by such means as crude revolt and Anabaptist communism could democracy come in; not by the Spirit without the Word, but only by the Spirit in the Word, not by Karlstadt or Münzer yet not without them but by Calvin in control of both. But for Calvin Loyola's counter-reformation would have recovered all; and the peasant war would have helped; for it was an uprising of human nature, and Catholicism, with its Pelagianism, is the Christianity of human nature. No wonder that to hierarchical Catholicism Calvin's is a name more hated than Luther, if less despised. He was the Loyola of Protestantism, the discoverer of the Reformation future as Loyola secured the future of Rome, the organiser of its victory for civilisation. He saved the Gospel, as Loyola has saved the Papacy.

And this Calvin was able to do especially through one of the two branches into which his movement spread. For this country these two branches came into close contact, and finally collision, in the Presbyterians and the Independents, the Republicans and the Democrats of their day. And we may take these names to represent the two phases of Calvinism to which I allude. It was

Calvinism alone, or that side of the Reformation, that mostly made the Puritans. And the unalloyed outcome of such Puritanism was Presbyterianism. But Puritanism, on another side of it, came under other influences. Calvinism had to be mixed with another metal to go into circulation as the medium of the new age. Through Holland, which became the refuge of all the remnants of Anabaptism that were missed by the German sword, spiritualistic and chiliastic influences laid strong hold of the early Calvinistic Independents, and of many Puritans who were not yet Independents. And these influences worked so mightily that they ended by capturing Puritanism for that Independency which appealed so strongly to the civil and local liberty indigenous in the English genius. For lack of this kindled public note and popular spirit Presbyterianism failed in England. It failed because it was an exotic. It was too Genevan, too Scottish, too precisian for the English, and even for the spiritual, nature. It was imported and planted in England, but not acclimatised. It was 'dumped.' Like Rome it strove to impose on the English nature foreign institutions by external force, without modification, without sympathy, without atmosphere. Like Rome it was an alien hierarchy, a theocracy without the free spirit of prophecy, and without the kind of ideals that appeal to the heart of a free nation mewing its mighty youth. Calvinistic popery was no more welcome in England than Roman. Presbyterianism failed, and left the English future to Independency.

To say that Independency owed itself to Calvin, however true, is little more true (if we put it so baldly) than to say it sprang from Luther. Only in part does it trace from the canonical Reformation at all. In great part it sprang from the radical and revolutionary movement alongside of the Reformation. This was suppressed in the land of its birth, and in form exterminated, because it had not a certain secret; but it was suppressed only to enter on a risen life, and a more powerful, in England, where the missing secret was found. The element always missing abroad was awaiting it here, in the public, political, and free quality of the English race.

It is not easy to find a fit name for the whole of this movement, so tragic, so utterly fruitless on the Continent. It was so composite of social reds and spiritual whites, of agitators and mystics, of tribunes and apostles, of Lilburnes and Foxes. It has been called spiritualistic, socialistic, and, by the Germans, enthusiastic. If the word enthusiastic had not received among us a wholly unworthy sense it is the term that would most conveniently fit the case. And if I use it it will be in the historic sense. In England the Chiliasts (or Millennarians), Ranters, Levellers, Anabaptists, Antinomians, Independents, Libertines, Enthusiasts were all names of parts that were applied to the whole. Apart from associations Libertines would be a useful term. Their common feature was the supremacy of the Spirit to the Word, of the unwritten over the written Word, of the inner light over outer truth, of free prophetic individualism over the historical continuity of the Church. I shall mostly call them Anabaptists or Spiritualists.

Nothing is easier than to lump the whole imbroglia of these struggling sects of the seventeenth century into one contemptible mass, and bundle it into an abyss of neglect by the sensible man. But sanity is not the first principle of religion, nor sound sense the ensign of Christianity. This treatment is too lordly to be historic, and it betrays that knowledge without insight which so easily besets the ordinary capable man—especially if he study fourteen hours a day.

The source of Independency was Calvinism, its genius was Anabaptism, its soil was the English character. Its historical source was Calvinism through Puritanism; its intrinsic genius was that enthusiastic Doppelgänger or obverse of the Reformation which we may conveniently call Ana-baptism (though the matter of baptism is quite secondary compared with the enthusiastic and spiritualistic note); and the soil in which it grew to its true self was that genius for practical politics, local self-government, and public freedom, civil and religious, which is England's note in history. Independency was Calvinism flushed and fertilised by Anabaptism on English ground. It drew from Calvinism its positive and theological Gospel of the Word, from Anabaptism its personal and subjective religion of the Spirit, and from England its free constitution of the Church, non-dynastic, non-territorial, and democratic. Therefore its note is a founded spiritual liberty, generated from a centre of Gospel which was theological, and not merely subjective, in its content, where the spirit did not override but realise the Word. If we distinguish spiritualistic liberty as an unchartered religious subjectivity, rationalistic liberty as an undogmatic fluidity of belief, and evangelical liberty as the creative release of the conscience into eternal life from its guilt and bondage before God, then the base of Independency is the last, its atmosphere is the first, and the second belongs to it up to the point where it begins to imperil the third.

What has been most overlooked by us, in going back to interpret our genius from our past, is the motherhood for us of Anabaptism. And among our sources of satisfaction may be numbered this, that we rescued this great movement, gave it to itself, and enabled it to rise purified from its dreadful martyrdom in its native land to become the most powerful factor in modern history. It is therefore worth some special attention, in the way of expanding what I suggested a few moments ago.

The Anabaptist movement, strictly so-called, was bound up with another, I have said, in the most fatal way. Anabaptism in itself was a movement of extreme spiritualism, the crude precursor of all that has made Quakerism most attractive and effective to many religious minds of our own day. But where Quakerism (in connection with Pennsylvania for instance) made friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, and exploited for better things the government of the time, Anabaptism took the other course, to its futile doom. It joined itself to the revolutionary socialism of the hour. It was not content to know that it had, like all Christianity, a political effect; it must also adopt a political mission, and even military methods. And it courted from the governments the extermination it received. It committed itself to the peasant insurrection, the national strike; and together they made the mystic socialism, the spiritualistic radicalism, which was the really popular side of the whole unsettlement that included the Reformation, and which became a greater danger to Lutherism for the time than Rome. The grievances of the peasants were indeed intolerable; but Luther had to tell them that he was an apostle and not a tribune, that direct redemption was not the same thing as immediate redress, that it could not be exploited for prompt social relief, that the kingdom of God did not come by cataclysm, and that freedom with God was not at the same moment freedom from feudal slavery—from rent, corvée, interest, tithes, and such things as furnished occasion for the overlord's rapacity and brutality. They were set for radical reform in economic affairs. He said that practical religion was experimental, that the most urgent affair was the soul's with God, and that reform was not truly radical till it was regenerative. Regeneration was the liberty which the Bible directly promised, and the only way to the safety and permanence of all social freedom. The message seemed to them then, as to their successors now it often seems, but mockery. So they stood outside the Reformation as its popular rival, in the frame of Mr. Keir Hardie's special hatred for Liberalism; covering more ground than the Reformation did, and threatening it more than it was threatened by the counter-reformation. Had Luther joined them, probably he and they would together have been extinguished by the princes, who were more dynastic than evangelical still; and with them would have gone all the Reformation stood for. Europe was not ready in the sixteenth century for the twentieth—as the twentieth is not ready even for the twenty-first. Rome would have been fixed on the West more firmly than before. The Reformation had positive realities behind it, the Revolution had but miseries, despairs, and ideals. And 'spiritualism and idealism are but regulative, they are not creative and constitutive principles.' They are not the powers that ride a whirlwind and rule a crisis of the first rank. It was a dreadful solitude for Luther to have against him the great Church, the fine humanism, and the maddened socialism of his day, with all the appeal made by utter misery and true piety to a humane, to say nothing of a Christian, heart.

The peasant leaders, and especially the Anabaptists, were mostly good Christian people, strict in life and ardent in soul, full of ethical principles, impatient ideals, mystical dreams, and social despairs; they were religious individualists charged with a literal supernaturalism and denationalised by long and bitter wrongs. Pacific anarchists by their nature, the Anabaptists among them have been called the Tolstoians of their day, opposed to a state, to war, to punishment, to an organised and political Church, and to all intolerance. In a negative form they had many of the conditions of the religious freedom of the future. They proposed, quite in Tolstoi's naïve way, to transfer straightway to the social life of the natural man everywhere the Sermon on the Mount—which is impossible for the natural man, and is there only for men waiting on Christ, men already Christian. They regarded it, without a vestige of historic sense, as the promulgation of an inspired and imperative constitution for society. Like all apocalyptic they were innocent of any historical treatment of the Bible, and they applied it offhand, with its face value, to the circumstances of the hour. Their failure on the Continent is another illustration of the fact that, though the cries, and struggles, and even the principles, of the oppressed may rouse attention and pose the problem, it is not the oppressed that make liberty practical politics, but the labour and sacrifice of a class that stands powerfully between the tyrants and the victims.

The movement was not called into life by the Reformation. It was not the radical end of the Reformation. It did not prolong the Reformation so much as exploit it. Its ideals were different. For centuries before such resentments and uprisings had become as chronic as feudal cruelty. But in the Reformation this old rebellion found a new chance. And the popularisation of the Bible gave a tremendous impulse to it with people for whom as yet every great movement must have religious sanction, who could take the book but in the letter, and who canonised for ever the parousial conditions of the first century of Christianity. This impulse was specially powerful in the Anabaptist circles where the religion was so intimate and personal. There, too, we have a movement which the Reformation did not create. It prolonged medieval mysticism where the peasant rising continued medieval revolt. And it was spiritualistic rather than evangelical. Its note was illumination rather than regeneration, or it was regeneration without the Gospel. Its spiritualism was not made simply by the new accessibility of the Bible; else we could not account for the totally different effect the Bible had on them and the Reformers, the different ideal of life it gave, and the different object in reform. They were not simply the religious forwards of the Reformation. They were a different movement and an older, which was greatly affected sympathetically by the general disturbance of the Reformation in the whole social and religious system. Both they and the social anarchists harked back not only to prior movements but even to Catholic principles. The roots of Independency lie in a continuity behind the Reformation. The peasants fell back on an agrarian socialism which new economic conditions had outgrown. And so the Anabaptists tried to combine a medieval and mystic idea of perfection with a subjective freedom more modern and more in contact with the Bible. So Anabaptism had this much in common with the medieval Church—a one-sided supernaturalism, which it carried to a head and crisis quite out of tune with the Reformation note. The Reformation broke this abstract, forced, and hectic spiritualism, which had marked Catholicism and made the monk. It bred a piety which worked morally from the conscience outwards. In Luther monasticism rose ethically from the soul to the conscience. The Reformation stress was not on a beatific vision or a rapt ecstasy, but on forgiveness as the regeneration of the conscience. But spiritualistic mysticism tends to be as unmoral as it is unhistoric, and it is always impatient of such a gospel as Luther's, which seems to it to mark but an early and outgrown stage of the soul. It speaks so to-day, and it spoke so then. The Word, it said, is very well, but the Spirit is more and higher. The Word of salvation is only to set free a deep spirituality cramped but not sick. It solicits rather than regenerates. And so the Anabaptists, and especially one wing of them, fretted under Luther's gospel of forgiveness as the perpetual obverse of eternal life. They thought the historicism of the Reformers was the limitation and not the foundation of Christianity, and that it represented but a new kind of secularity by comparison with their own spirituality. They treated sanctification too much as the evolution of native spirituality and too little as the growth of a moral re-creation. And from a spirituality merely implanted by the Spirit of God, apart from the work of Christ, they readily went on to think only of a spirituality innate but hampered in the soul of man. So that in saving men God rather pressed a button (if one may so speak) than wiped a slate. They made too much of an immediate divine inspiration for each, and too little of the Bible as the unique and final revelation for all. For them the Spirit was a new dispensation, and added a new region to revelation. They developed the Spirit, not through the Word, but over its head, and at its cost; and they were the ancestors of all who find Christ but the chief symbol of the sacramental agencies which unite the soul with God. The Spirit in their personal experience was coequated with the Bible, of which it really and practically took the lead. It was a new and independent rule of faith (if such impulses had a rule) rising from deeper depths of man's inner spirituality under the stimulus of God. One thing that drew them to the socialist side was their proneness to discredit the moral order that society had already evolved, in order to return to a putative state of nature prior to the Fall, where communism prevailed, government was needless, authority superfluous, and each followed his inner light, or his immediate divine inspiration. Long before the Reformation the masses cherished the mythological idea that personal liberty of a complete and ideal kind was man's first estate, which had been corrupted and destroyed by tyranny. Inspiration took the place of faith with these Spiritualists, as happened also in the case of their legatees, the Quakers, with a supernatural inner light, and the Rationalists, with a natural. Their indifference to the social order was largely due also to the fact (which had the same effect in New Testament times) that they lived in constant expectation of Christ's return in a sudden, speedy, and purely preternatural way; and they had no more room or use for the historic evolution of Christian society in the future than in the past. They were apt also to be held together more externally by their antipathies than inwardly by their sympathies, which were atomic and anarchic. They united to resist any historical and organised church, as their social wing was opposed to the historic state. The aversion to the Church became centred and symbolised in their rejection of infant baptism on its threshold. Their positive bond, in so far as it was a bond, lay in their appeal to the inner light, to the individual experience, natural or supernatural, and in their efforts to set up communities of saints and perfectionists, which continually dissolved for want of a thread upon which to crystallise. It will be seen as we go on of what religious value and political importance this last feature became when transplanted to England.

It was only later, only after the bloody death of the whole movement abroad that their gospel of regeneration was regenerated, and its immortal soul rose and entered on its true kingdom here. It produced the Independents and Baptists, who again have been the real founders of modern democracy, in a very modified continuity with the Reformation. It was not peasant wars, nor Anabaptist brotherhoods, nor any mystic or anarchic radicalism that brought in the vast future. It was made by churches and not by groups. Fraternities cannot bring in the great brotherhood. These things by themselves passed like devastating storms—negative and sterile. The peasant rising and the Anabaptist experiments made the German counterpart of the French Revolution. They were equally catastrophic, and in their direct results even more barren. As the fashion of the day was, the movement sought religious sanction and colour. And it thought it found them partially in the work of the Reformers.

Yet the Reformation was not its cause, as I have said. At most it was its opportunity. Still the two streams became so much involved that the Reformers' treatment of the rising did much to discredit and arrest the Reformation, especially on its popular side. It turned the peasantry from it and recatholicised South Germany. The Reformers lost by it, and the princes won. For the medieval theory of the state continued as yet to hold the field. It recovered for Luther himself a hold which had been shaken by the first creative power and logic of his principles. Within a few years he was contradicting as a statesman all he had first said as a prophet.¹ It was not, as Troeltsch says, the Reformation that destroyed medievalism; it was Dissent, it was Independency, and the democracy it made.

The social revolution of that day gathered to the Reformation and tried to exploit it, as its successors have in various forms sought to exploit both a democratic Church, a popular Christianity, and an open Bible. It gathered to the Reformation in a vague response to its note of freedom. But the Reformation was not primarily a battle for freedom. It was much more. It was a battle for the truth that makes freedom, for saving truth. Freedom was but a means to God's truth and kingdom as the end. And it was truth 'activist,' not as knowledge but as reality, as truth of life and action, as moral effect, as salvation, private and social. Its question was not social, nor even theological, but spiritual. Is salvation direct from God to the soul, or is it by the mediation of the Church? It declared for the former. And the whole issue of freedom was raised by consequence, though sometimes by a long consequence. For the freedom of a Christian man did not mean for Luther what came to be meant by its corollary 'religious liberty,' or liberty of conscience. Religious liberty (as I shall show later) did not mean for him or his a liberty among men to choose your religion; nor did liberty of conscience mean liberty to follow conscience in spite of society. It meant something higher and deeper—freedom before God by God's own grace in Christ. It certainly did not mean freedom to be free from God. The Reformation freedom therefore was not the republication of man's natural freedom revised, but the revelation of a new freedom only in the Gospel—a freedom by redemption, not creation. It was therefore freedom of soul, not either of thought or action. But it is not wonderful that another passion, the passion for social freedom, was the popular passion of the hour.

It is so easy to-day ; what must it have been then ? The growth of capital, which is given to him that already hath, and the failure of the ruler's power to curb the rich, had almost extirpated the free yeomanry (as has happened under the plutocracy in our own rural parts). It had gradually reduced them to vassals, through the mortgage of one after another of their rights and properties. They were but tenants of 'led farms' or 'tied houses,' and the rent which they could not find in cash was taken to the last farthing in service and dues of various kinds. The people became serfs in various degrees, under what was for the most part the worst brutality. If they had to borrow money it was from capitalists whose interests were the same as that of the landowners. The incessant wars added to these devastations on their holdings. The bitterness and despair were unspeakable. Anything would be better than what was. Catastrophe could leave them no worse. The air was full of imminent convulsion and brooding apocalypse. Some grand parousia might any day arrive and welcome. The occultists and wizards of all kinds peeped and muttered to the like purpose. This was the social meteorology of the time. When the Reformation emerged it diverted attention for a season. But as evangelical reformation it did not appeal to the state of mind I have described, full of wrongs rather than guilt. With misery and despair driving them to hope only in some redress, violent and eschatological, no apostles were likely to be well heard whose whole stress was on the ethical. The voice of reform is silenced in the storm of revolution, and faith seems futile to a state of fury. An ethical gospel can never make direct headway in a time of social convulsion and a falling order of things. The situation repeated in many features that which apostolic Christianity had to face in the first century. Then it was the philanthropy of the first Christians that got a first hearing for their true gospel on any large scale. Unfortunately the course events took at the Reformation was very different ; it was associated with extermination rather than benevolence ; and the philanthropic development of the new principle, like its missions, did not come for a century or two after it had been at work in other directions. Nor did it arrive in the native land of the Reformation. Indeed two crowning misfortunes befell the Reformation, from which the continent of Europe has never recovered. The first was its association with the territorial princes in the establishment of the Church and in the harrying of the peasants and Anabaptists. That was in Germany. And the second was the Bartholomew in France. The latter was thorough, successful, and fatal. It destroyed French Puritanism, and killed the Reformation in France. The former was not fatal, but it was most disastrous. It destroyed anything in Germany corresponding to Independency, secluded the country from the best influences of democracy, and has thrown the cause of progress and the people too much into the hands of socialism.

Since it was not the peasant war that was transplanted to England, but the other and more religious element, I may perhaps be pardoned if I give a little more space to its description. It is not quite easy.¹ The ban of the Reformers has lain for long on the great subjective movement of that time, and caused it to be much neglected and therefore misunderstood. That ban may have been a historical necessity, like the attitude of the early Catholic Church to the Gnostics and other heretics of the day. But in both cases we have become accustomed to take the heretic at the orthodox valuation, and in many instances the writings in which the defeated side said what they could for themselves, have been either lost, deflected, or ignored. We are either dependent on selections quoted by the opponents without a context, or we have been willing to take the orthodox estimate without verifying the references by such data as are extant on the other side. The existence of Protestantism in Europe was bound up with the one side, and naturally that side has monopolised attention, as Protestantism is still fighting its case. As a result we are much in the dark about the precise views of the non-Catholics outside the Reformation, and we are apt to think of the whole mass as a tangle of individual fantasy. And we lump them indiscriminately under a variety of names like those which designate the jungle of sects in our own Commonwealth time.

But the whole movement is now receiving closer attention; and two tendencies within it emerge in particular, for which it is convenient to select two names with distinctive meaning, which I have hitherto used as more or less synonymous. These are the Anabaptists and the Spiritualists, as represented respectively by Karlstadt or Münzer, and Franck or Weigel.

They were distinguished thus in the main.

In respect of the Norm, or standard, the Anabaptists found it in the letter of the Bible, the Spiritualists in the spiritualising of the Bible, or in an 'inner word' quite detached from the Bible.

In respect of Ethic, the Anabaptists fell back on a literal application of the Sermon on the Mount, as if Christ were the Moses of the new covenant, and came to legislate in that codal sense. They were therefore firmly set against oaths, war, or retaliation of any kind—all in a nomistic way. The Spiritualists also spoke of a new law, but they meant by it the law written in the heart, and lighted up by the immediate action of the Spirit. They were not legalist. The outer act profited little, the inner frame was all.

As to the Church. For the Anabaptists the true Church was visible. It stood on a pact of believers. Its badge was their baptism on faith. The Church was the fellowship of such believers, whose note was the complete fulfilment of the Christian law—Christian conduct, according to a Christian code. Purity was maintained by strict discipline, administered by the unanimity or majority of the members. And salvation depended on membership of the true Church delimited thus. Infant baptism was discarded because it was not enforced by Christ, and because baptism was not a means of grace but a sign of covenant relationship with God. The Spiritualists, on the other hand, held that the true Church was invisible, and cognisable by no outward signs like sacrament or preaching. It could not be constituted by any pact of men, and it had existed from the foundation of the world. Its king was the inner Christ, its law the inner word. The Lord is Spirit. It included the devout heathen, and all who had the Spirit. It is not necessary to belong to any visible church, the communion with Christ and each other is purely inward, and the membership is known only to God. No human discipline can draw the line. Excommunication is out of the question, as being dependent on external standards; and only the inner spirit can interpret the outward word. Majorities are always wrong, as true Christians are always in a minority. Baptism was rejected in either form, or treated only as an outer form of small value.

It will be seen that while the Independency of the eighteenth century carried on the Anabaptist tradition, a considerable section of the Independency of the nineteenth took up the Spiritualist, and, theologically at least, were more in sympathy with the Quaker sect.

Both the Anabaptists and the Spiritualists were exposed to persecution. And both protested against it. The Anabaptists because they held that the Christian law of love was intended to apply to the government as well as to the group. Both were under the law of nature, and the true law of nature (the Anabaptists thought, with the medieval 'sects') was revealed to be identical with the Sermon on the Mount. In the great coming kingdom the Sermon on the Mount would be the supreme code, both for the State and the soul. It was not quite consistent with this when they thought that once the thousand years reign of the saints arrived they should execute the judgment of God on the godless with the sword. The protest of the Spiritualists against persecution was different. It stood first on the nature of faith, which was a higher law that the government ought to respect as a limit on its power. Spiritual freedom was spiritually discerned and spiritually legitimated; and governments should keep within the four corners of their secular commission. Besides, they said, external standards have no relevance to faith. The letter of Scripture is at points uncertain, the translation in dispute, the parts are contradictory. Each church, too, has its own confession, so none of these can be the norm of the one Spirit. Who decides the true confession? Still farther they quoted Luther himself to prove that false belief was never suppressed by coercion. Heresy was a spiritual thing, and not amenable to the methods of blood and iron.

As to the Reformation of the Church the Anabaptists said the true body of Christ was a visible community in the apostles' time. But it had long vanished, till it was reconstituted by the Anabaptists themselves. True to their idea of the Church as visible, they said the very first church as visible was not without hypocrites as well as saints. Its collapse could only be repaired by a special divine intervention, attested by such signs and wonders as the apostles brought. This had not yet come, and the Church was still 'in the wilderness.' The existing churches had no divine authority. True Christians had only one duty—to prophesy, prophesy, freely, and prepare the way. But a visible Church was really as needless for salvation as a written or preached Word.

Some of these considerations are still good and always true. But they coexist in an atmosphere of spiritual Nihilism which was as sterile for practical effect then as we find it to be now.

It will appear that Anabaptism had a certain church constitution. It was an organisation of believers which was democratic in its nature, with social interests that sympathised much with the social unrest of the time, tending to communism of a kind, with much concern for the poor, the sick, and the orphan, and with offices accordingly—deacons and deaconesses. It was poor in ideas and rich in sympathies (like much beneficent orthodoxy still), mystic in its piety, and literal in its ethic. And it had more affinity with Brownist Calvinism than with Lutheranism. Spiritualism, on the other hand, had little interest in any constitution for a church. It was indifferent or opposed to official or institutional religion altogether. Spirit is bound to no forms; all forms can be spiritualised. It was without the optimism which looks forward to the thousand years reign, and its tendency was pessimistic. The world lies in a wickedness which can only be destroyed. Efforts at amelioration could only end in disillusioned resignation. Spiritualism was too ideal to be social in its interests. The ultra-spirituality of its church led to its practical negation. Its religion became individualist—the alone with the Alone. In so far as it did become a community it gravitated to Anabaptism, like the Quakers. And its devotion to the Logos Spermatikos, the Christly reason of God in every man, became detached from mysticism and readily ran down into rationalism, and finally into a dialectic chiefly occupied with criticism of anything like positive religion.

In Independency the influences of Anabaptism and Spiritualism meet, mix, and often collide. It represents the mediating position of Schwenkfeldt rather than either Karlstadt or Franck. And especially so in not recognising any chance assembly of Christians as a church, but only those equipped with the apostolic functions of ministers, deacons, and discipline; and also in refusing to recognise the Christ in every man as the divine remnant that had escaped the Fall. This was the chief difference between Anabaptism and Spiritualism. For the Anabaptists, and especially Schwenkfeldt, said that it reduced Christ to be but a partial Saviour, and divided the active power in salvation between man and God. Schwenkfeldt has great value for Independency. Close as he was to the Spiritualists on many points, yet he was nearer to Münzer and to Independency in insisting that the inner Word was the eternal and incarnate Son who entered the man at a certain point of conversion, and made him a new creature. That is the Christ in us. Otherwise, by the presence of the Logos with evil men, we have but a concord of Christ with Belial, and a communion of light with darkness. There could be no talk of each man being a potential Christ, which is alien and even hostile to our belief and our constitution based on it.

But as soon as we recognise the great influence on Independency of this third religious factor in the sixteenth century, beyond Catholicism and the Reformation, as soon as we realise the effect of it acting (through Holland especially) upon Calvinism rather than Lutheranism, we have some explanation of features in Independency which otherwise seem but eccentric. Just as in the Anglican Church, which lingered behind the Reformation, violent antitheses like Low Church and High seem each able to claim an equal footing in the formularies, because these were in the nature of a compromise, so also with Independency, which was so much beyond the Reformation. The Calvinistic rigour of one age of it, the evangelistic fervour of another, and the mystical or rationalist extravagances of a third, all find some explanation in the composite influences that moulded its plastic time. On the whole, if we leave out for the moment the Calvinism, it was the more positive leading of Anabaptism that Independency chiefly followed. But it was sufficiently affected by the Spiritualistic tendency to account for such fits of theological Nihilism as have recently developed under the influence of rationalist criticism and mystical monism from the nations around. Even when the Monotheism of Israel was well established, the people was not immune from the revival of old pagan tendencies, through contact with the philosophies of the West and the gnosticisms of the East. And Independency, even since it has been set on its positive base for good and all, has had enough sense of a world mission, and it has refused to settle into a mere sect, so far as this—that it has been much coloured, and in corners submerged, by the worldly movements of a critical, social, and philosophic age. To this side we must now attend.

LECTURE III

RATIONAL SPIRITUALISM

FROM the point which views Independency as a chief historic factor of the modern political world the Co-Reformation was of more importance than the Reformation. And as this truth has been so much overlooked it is worth some risk of repetition to develop its nature. We have seen its two distinctive elements to be those which are such powerful ferments at this very hour that we think them new—the social and the spiritualistic, with an animus against what is called the theological. Their inner misfortune then was one that recurs now; they became severed from the evangelical foundation and control of the Reformation Word. And it was the work of Independency in its great age, by restoring that authority, to provide the positive base which alone could bring the other two factors to their own. We should be very clear what these were. The social side I have discussed. We are not done with it yet. What the Levellers showed in the seventeenth century the Christian socialists show to-day. But the other, the spiritualist side, was even more tenacious and influential. The social revolution of the sixteenth century was quenched in torrents of blood. 'No movement ever spent more martyr blood, or to less purpose.' But the spiritualist element survived the massacres as a man who has had the shock and lesson of his life. It was carried by refugees to other lands, and especially to Holland, and thence to England, where it did not so much flourish anew as become transfused with such immense effect into the Calvinism of the Puritan movement as to create Independency. It could not be expected to be on speaking terms with Lutheranism as its persecutor, but it had much to do historically with the Calvinism both of Holland and England. As we have seen, also, there was a gap in the Calvinist doctrine of the Spirit's relation to the Word which gave at least a footing to the spiritualism that tended to detach them altogether. We may therefore, perhaps, not grudge time to ask more closely what was the spiritual meaning of this Anabaptism, as we may agree, generally rather than strictly, to call the enthusiastic religion which tended to look down on the Reformation as but a passage from one slavery to another. And in this lecture I should like to do it from the side which had least theological affinity with the Reformation—from the rationalistic side.

The Reformers broke the Church as the steward of the Spirit and of Grace. In its stead they placed the Bible. But what was the exact connection of the Bible with the Holy Spirit of Grace? What replaces the Church as interpreter of the Bible? Was it the school—the theologians and scholars? Then we have a new hierarchy. For their doctrine was put forth not simply as the science of faith, but as the code which deciphered the Bible, and therefore as the means of salvation. And this doctrinaire hierarchy was in some ways worse than the old sacerdotal. They spoke of the witness of the Spirit; did they mean it? How far did the possession of the Spirit entitle the laity to revise or reject their conclusions?

Troeltsch says four questions arose. 1. How far might personal illumination be detached from the authority of the Bible? How far might the possession of the Spirit—mystic temperament, devout application, or a special inspiration—entitle a man to claim that he had a new contribution beyond what was in the Bible? How far was he the organ of a higher dispensation which did not realise the old but reveal the new, which did not work the old mine but drove a new shaft? How far did the Spirit give new productivity in the present? How far did He give new truth, parallel and coequal with that which He produced in the first Church? The Anabaptists answered these questions on the whole in a Montanist way, by moving to supersede the Bible in the Spirit's name, to leave it behind, and to ignore its unique, permanent, and providential finality in the economy of salvation. And it will mostly be found (then as now) that what seemed to be new truths for them were but reminiscences for the Church—the refurbishing of ideas which its genius had from time to time found in the Gospel but which had not been organised into the current belief.

2. Where is the real and final seat of revelation? Is it in the inner or the outer Word, the experimental or the historic, the unwritten or the written? How far is the standard for interpreting the Bible in the inner light and its seal? If the Bible is freely popularised in respect of its spread must it not be fully laicised in respect of its meaning? If it is put in every one's own hands must it not be read by every one's own light? Can it be the layman's book otherwise? If it is said that the key is the Holy Spirit, is not the Holy Spirit the individualising power of God to every man? If inwardness and spirituality be the great and final thing where is there room for any external authority, whether priest, or theologian, or the Bible itself*as a book? The supreme meaning—is it not the simple and obvious one either to each Christian or even to each man? It is easy to see the solvent results of such views at a time so theological, when the Spirit's effect was sought so much in illuminationist knowledge instead of moral and social power.

3. How far is the Bible the rule of life? If we follow its model way of social life, are we not shut up to a radicalism, or a communism, reproducing the conditions of the first century—indifferent to the state, hostile to the world and its culture, other-worldly, sectarian, eschatological, violent, parousial, in its outlook, hoping everything from salvation and nothing from development? They did not seem to realise that this was making an external authority both of the Bible and of the first century.

4. How far should we repudiate earthly government as due to sin and the mere law of fallen nature? Does not the principle of the spiritual community destroy a Church of the State, or indeed any community organised on natural lines for spiritual things? Is Christian ethic merely an expansion of the law of nature? Is it not a product of special pneumatic revelation to the elect soul?

The first two of these tendencies continued and increased the various sectarian movements which for centuries had been recalcitrant to Church authority in the name of a mystic spiritualism.

We can see the same thing working in the orders, which, however, the Church had the tact to take up and regularise. Such movements were all fostered by the reaction of religious inwardness from an outward and worldly Church, and by the kind of restlessness that marks a revolutionary time which yet placed a religious hue upon everything.

The two latter tendencies recall us to Wycliffe, and to the various proletarian revolts from the growing abuses to which he gave an utterance so kindled and so keen. The Bible was treated as a republication of the law of nature; but of nature as it was before the Fall, not since; for it had since become the mere right of the stronger. Or they fell back on the new nature, as it was in the very first Church, before it was debased by politicians, theologians, and philosophers to the level of the world, with the world's private property, official authority, hard justice, and loveless force. Go back to the Sermon on the Mount, they said, with its reissue of the first ideal state. 'That is God's will for the constitution of society; and to realise God's will, so clearly put, is our charge.' So far as obedience to that edict of Christ was concerned they thought the reformed parsons were no better than the old priests. Such was the result of treating Christ's words as edicts and His work as a new code.

Then, as now, such views won a very wide vogue, as simple lay-religion or practical mysticism, among the working classes and the small citizens, who found all the theology of grace to be sophistication, and too humiliating for a plain honest man's religion. They were views which became the source and marrow of much in the Anabaptist movements and their associations. There was an almost angry impatience of the evangelical movement of the Reformation; and not because it was theological (for that was no fault in those days) but as it centred in the forgiveness of sin. Redress and reform filled the hour. There was a vehement reaction against such theology, against any theological theocracy, as also against the association of Christianity with Church order, social position, or political authority. But the aversion was not to theology as such. Some instructed and gifted theologians helped the movement, like Franck and Weigel, whose views it is more than interesting to summarise at a time like the present. They show the antiquity of modernism, as a similar study of Gnosticism would show it in the second century.

Sebastian Franck was a modernist with a wonderful vivacity of mind and gift of style, whose theology was briefly this. He was quite indifferent to historic Christianity, and that in the name of the Christian spirit. The truth and power of God was inborn in man, and inalienable. It had indeed become obscured by sin, so that it came to its own only through a struggle between the Spirit and the flesh. But for the victory no external or historic aid was required. The historic Jesus dissolved into the eternal Christ logos in humanity, some vital and potent fragment of which was in every man, and was equal to his restoration if he would. The only value of the gospel history was symbolic, suggestive, and evoking. It made us aware of our subliminal resources, of our innate Christ, of a holy spirit of our own.

Weigel is still more explicit and systematic. He is modern enough to be even psychological. What man receives from without is not revelation, not knowledge, and not even impression, but only stimulus. The external history is a mere touch on a button, as it were, which releases the native power of the human spirit into consciousness of itself. It is a mere solicitation or provocation of the excellent soul. It puts into action the wondrous spiritual machinery of man. The Word, therefore, spoken or written, can but awake a man to his inborn and inalienable spiritual resources, and make him aware of the God always immanent in him and in due time becoming conscious. Personality is independent of history, and therefore of Jesus Christ, except as a mere means of edification, a mere symbol of a principle, and a mere expression of the Christ immanent in the constitution of humanity. The Bible has to make itself good before this inner Christ and native forum of the Spirit. It is to be accepted only in so far as it agrees with the eternal Word of God written in human nature at its best. It is not a means of grace, certainly not a unique means, nor is it any exceptional revelation.¹

But Franck and Weigel represent only one side of the Anabaptist movements—the rationalist and naturalistic side with which the extremists have made us familiar to-day. There was a second group, as I have already indicated, which also postponed the Word, but which made much more of the evangelical base, the real regeneration, and the supernatural Spirit. They were represented by Karlstadt, Münzer, and especially Schwenkfeldt; and it was they whose tradition, through the Dutch Mennonites, acted most strongly on Independency, and also generated Quakerism. It might almost be said that Schwenkfeldt was the first Independent. They believed in a distinct and direct action of the Holy Spirit on the human, coming ab extra, and at particular moments. Some of them thought of it as the source of new illuminations, others as the source of new power, according as their interest was in truth or in life. The former, like the apocalyp-tics and visionaries both of the early Church and of our own, gave great weight to the historical revelation in Christ, but they urged that it did not end revelation. They worthily desired to realise God as the constant light and close guide of every man at every hour; but what they called fresh revelations were really no more than the flashes which the new juncture or the new thought struck from the old Word. They made much of that Word, if not all. What was wrong was their theology rather than their practice. Schwenkfeldt was very urgent about the immediate action of the Spirit of God in a religious and moral re-creation, which the naturalistic wing would have thought uncalled for, or would have treated as a mere waking of us up to our native resources. But he confined the function of the Word to the mind only. It informed us of truth. But it could give it no access to our inner man. The truth of the Word was still an external and noetic thing. The Word is a mere sign, an alphabet, a written symbol. It was not sacramental. It did not, could not, convey itself to the soul. Schwenkfeldt was the victim of a false theory of knowledge, in thinking that there was nothing sacramental in what came by eye or ear, that it was not charged with spiritual significance. The knowledge given by the Word was spiritually useless, he thought, till it was taken up and turned to account by an action of the Spirit quite subsequent and independent of it (and then only for the predestinate). This inner action of God on the elect was independent of the historical work of Christ. The outer Word received its spiritual content only from the spirit-filled man.

Schwenkfeldt reproduced in respect of history Cole-ridge's subjective fallacy in respect of Nature—

‘O lady, we receive but what we give,
And in our life alone does Nature live.’

His religious relation to the historic Christ was much closer than his theological—which was very well for him, but ill for those he taught, and,
especially, for those he influenced so widely apart from personal contact. Personal sanctity may carry off lack of culture, and pastoral efficiency may more than make good theological deficiency, but not for the great public, and not for the next generation. Piety is the religion of the individual, but theology is the religion of the generations.
And Schwenkfeldt forgot, besides, that we know
of Christ only through the Bible and the Church, that a saving Christ could only be transmitted by a sacramental testimony and not merely an informational, and that therefore Word and Spirit

were not merely in contact but in organic unity and reciprocity from the first. But like many devotees both of his own time and ours, by a mystic immersion in spirituality, he formed a speculative idea how God should act, and then construed the past accordingly, instead of reading God's actual will out of His historic revelation. But there is more excuse for us than for him; for he did not face a history which criticism had made for so many a tremulous haze.

It will be clear that Anabaptism was not a movement like orthodox pietism. We are often accustomed to associate a vehement spirituality with a somewhat stiff and conventional creed. But that is partly a result of the pietistic movement, which came much later, and the evangelical movement which was later still. These wore an animated orthodoxy which Anabaptism did not. It is partly due also to the suggestions which the name contains of continuity with the Baptists and their views. The Anabaptists were everything but orthodox. At the same time (as I have shown) they were not all rationalists in the sense that that word has borne since the illuminationism of the eighteenth century. They were heretical saints rather than heretical philosophers, and, apart from their opinions, are better represented by Karlstadt and Münzer with their direct supernatural illumination by the Holy Spirit, than by either Franck or Weigel with their natural light from the human spirit. No doubt the movement tended in its grandchildren to a bald rationalism, but it was not Socinian in its first note, though Socinianism, like other things, found a ready soil in it. It represented, as a whole, mantic heresy rather than rationalist, prophetic error rather than prosaic, the heresy of the self-taught preacher rather than of the too-schooled thinker, of gracious unction rather than lucid insight, of confident intuition rather than sceptical thought. Its atmosphere was religious rather than rational or even idealist—though our later idealism is its adult stage, when philosophy takes the place of theology. Some of these pneumatics (as I say) relied on the inner light as a native spirituality in man, some trusted in it rather as a supernatural visitation. But both sections severed the Spirit from historic revelation, and declared that the region of revelation was extended in matter, and not simply deepened in appreciation, by the new dispensation. They did believe in the Spirit, especially against the world; and there was an intimacy, purity, and passion in their religion not always guaranteed by a truer faith. But the Spirit took the place of the Word, and ultimately a higher place. Its voice was in the ecstatic experience, the conscience, or the reason. And the constant gravitation of the movement, in proportion as it sought to be intelligent, was to a rationalism whose light became very dry as the first glow of the elation faded; which is the natural history of the doctrine of the inner light everywhere as the rule of faith.

To sum up therefore, the whole tendency may be described as a mystic radicalism, a romantic socialism, & spiritualistic lay-religion which makes little of Christ's priestly work or final word, being preoccupied very excusably with present ills, present impulses, and visionary hopes, but devoid of historic sense, historic continuity, practical policy, or any grasp of the unique place of the Bible, the Church, or the Saviour, in the economy of providence or the making of the soul. It drew largely on the Theologia Germanica, as our modern altruistic positivism (in George Eliot for instance) used the Imitatio. Its notes are gathered up as the enthusiasm of the inner light, the detachment of the religious community from the state and the world (which meant much more than separation in our sense), the sanctity of brotherly love and spiritual comradeship, quietist submission to persecution, and the conversion (and therefore the debasement) of Christianity from a new creation to a new law, chiefly codified in the Sermon on the Mount. Generally it substituted the Gospels for the Gospel; it appealed from an organised church to a mystic fellowship of the pious democrats and the oppressed; and it took social form in a loose congeries of groups, spiritual and futurist, whose function was mutual comfort and edification, with no church preaching a commanding gospel to the world. They had many gifted and even original leaders, who were often, however, more interesting than fertile, more illuminative than regenerative, more genial than apostolic, preachers rather than theologians, and preachers of goodness rather than grace, hierophants whose theology was hierophantastic, and whose truth came as rain on the mown grass, or as gleams through the clouds, rather than as the solar power from a centre that continually renovates, animates, and orders all. Their aim, in so far as it was theological at all, was a simple lay Bible theology, without either science or imagination. They were unversed in the moral psychology either of holiness or sin; and they repudiated, therefore, what they called the artificial theology of the great reformers, who really reformed, where the spiritualists only renounced, the great penitential tradition of the Church of Redemption. Many of them (as I have said), following the spiritualistic line, developed the inner light as the most pious Quakers subsequently did who inherited their strain. But many also developed it later on other lines. They denied the Godhead of Christ. They separated the ideal or spiritual Christ from the historic. They cultivated an undogmatic religion, a spiritual agnosticism, with an unlimited tolerance which meant no positive gospel, but only a mystic and ethical religiosity. They spiritualised heaven and hell, and in their philosophy were monistic, or panentheistic at best. And they show what our own day shows, that, as soon as the hold of the historic gospel is lost, the natural man asserts itself from age to age in quite a monotonous and venerable way by a natural theology more or less spiritualised.

It will have been clear that their objection to the Reformers was twofold. They resisted the State Churchism which so early took possession of the Reformation; and here they were prophetic, but more prophetic than effective. And they took exception to the great Reformation principle of faith in grace, which reconstructs everything from one new creative centre of forgiveness and redemption. They objected to the Reformers' interpretation of grace as mercy. If the Romanists represented one extreme, in which grace was a sacramental and infusory thing, the Anabaptists represented the other, so familiar to us, wherein grace is the general favour and fatherliness of God, whose benedictions were always dropping silently into the bosom of His children. Grace meant any benediction from God's kindness, whether it released the conscience or only blessed it, whether it produced a new creation or only a new refreshment. The grace which had mercy on our guilt was not the central or recreative thing, but only one of the modes in which God's general and unfailing kindness acted according to need. In Luther's sense of the word it was not needed by all, nor by all who did need it was it needed equally.

Troeltsch, who has interpreted this side of the Reformation age with extraordinary insight, finds such aspects of it very congenial. He is especially drawn to Sebastian Franck (who is indeed attractive enough), and he roundly declares that modern Protestantism is nearer to Franck than to Luther. That is a judgment of tremendous significance. It is as if it were said that an enlightened Phariseeism was a truer legatee of Christ than Paul was. It means that evangelical Protestantism has simply a historic value, which every year that passes makes more archæological. The whole movement of theological liberalism and modernism, Protestant or Roman, seems agreed to evict Reformation Christianity in so far as it is founded on an evangelical crisis of the soul, and to take rational possession of its assets in the name of a highly spiritualised naturalism. The rational and illuminationist reformation overleaps, with some contempt, the reformation of moral re-creation, which by the aid of modern psychology it endeavours to explain away. In his analysis of historic causes and movements, however, Troeltsch is admirable and original, and, except Weingarten, no German has done such justice to English Dissent.

LECTURE IV

ANABAPTISM AND INDEPENDENCY—I

THE Anabaptists (it may have appeared) in one way went back behind the Reformation, and in another they went forward far beyond it. Ethically, evangelically, they were in reaction, religiously they were in advance. They left the world to go unto the Father, but they also left the Word to go to the Spirit; and leaving the Word they left the Son, and therefore the Father's final will.

1. They went behind the Reformation in attaching themselves to the medieval note of mysticism, non-historic, and non-moral, and in going round the most new and positive moral factor in the Reformation. The Reformation, like English Non-conformity, restored the moral passion of the Christian idea in the New Testament, its rugged, invasive, miraculous note, its radically new creation, which medievalism, under classic and urbane influences, had erased. It made the soul's religious relation with God a moral thing in a way not only radical but revolutionary, by healing a breach which meant to the conscience not simply damage but damnation. It made religion a thing of God's righteousness, and therefore made it the life indeed. It made the true inwardness a matter, not of intuition, or sensibility, or temperament, or any such pious thing but of a world-forgiveness, regeneration, and eternal life. It was a theology of fact more than of consciousness. It thus raised its evangelical protest against mere moralism in the region of the conscience, and against mere elation or pantheistic fusion in the region of the soul's communion with God. To the Anabaptists all this seemed forced, elaborate, unlaical, and even ethically dangerous. Their lay-religion was not universal priesthood but simple sonship. They pressed beyond a reckoned righteousness in faith to an actual righteousness in conduct and experience; and they did so in a plausible way which is still very familiar and seems very business-like, simple, and common-sense. The question only begins to be acute when we press on to ask—experience of what? And as it grows acuter the answer grows pointed and thorough, it grows theological. There is no doubt that if it be lay-religion to discard theology it must be lay-religion also to go on and discard historical Christianity, as the Anabaptists tended to do. For historical Christianity, the Christianity of the New Testament, is theological. It is not simply spiritual. It is not simply pious. It is not simply genial. It is not simply filial.

So far as this goes Anabaptism was reactionary. It was but Judaism spiritualised by contact with Greek idealism, Judaism neo-platonised. And it showed it in its ethic, which was ascetic, meticulous, synagogal, conventiclist, what would now be called seminarist, and savoured of the Nonconformist conscience in the inferior sense of that ambiguous term. Whereas the good side of the State Churchism of the Reformation, continued in Cromwellian Independency, was that it had a more actual historic influence and a wider historic outlook. Its ethical principles, as they were practical and corporate, so were national; as they were radical, so were universal; as they sprang from the soul new created to its last base, so also they were on the scale of the whole world. It is a curious thing, but it is possible for a movement or a church to be very evangelical on the extensive scale but not evangelical at all on the intensive. That is to say it is Low Church. It spreads its gospel over the face of the earth, but not into the thought and temper of the age. It covers, but it does not leaven. It does not recreate the age's habit of mind, or affect at all its culture, while it is tremendously earnest and enterprising in gathering converts in from the whole world. That is why missions, which owe so much to Low Church, are losing their staying power. They spread the Word rapidly—but so thin that it cracks. The Reformation, on the other hand, aimed at mastering civilisation and not merely protesting and withdrawing from it. It aimed at mastering civilisation rather than covering the world in missions. It would make civilisation itself first Christian and then missionary; and so it would abolish the chief drawback which missions experience in the paganism of the civilisation from which they go. And though it has too often been victimised by the civilisation it sought to convert, such conversion of affairs was at least its aim. It contemplated a Christian world, and not a sectarian, or a chiliastic. The lex naturae to which it went back was what it actually found, as the medieval legacy of a church not wholly deserted by the Spirit of God; and it set to work on this concrete situation and modified it by its new idea of faith. It did not call society a massa perditionis, nor government a mere consequence of the Fall. It left the natural constitution of man and his justitia civilis, his civic righteousness, undestroyed by the Fall, however damaged. It did not believe in total corruption, but only in total helplessness to regain communion with God.

With the Anabaptists it was otherwise. They reverted, in a monastic way, to some imagined, perfect, and prehistoric state. They lived therefore in a world of isolation, elation, and catastrophic hopes. Like most radicals, and all revolutionaries, they had no historic sense. They simply resumed the anti-secular note of the first century, with its sharp parousial supernaturalism; and they cultivated a literal Biblicism, in spite of the fact that they repudiated the external authority of Church, Bible, and dogma. Even within the Bible they preferred the Sermon on the Mount to St. Paul, like Erasmus, from whose pupils they got much help.

They represent in truth the second great movement of a long, old tendency, whose first movement filled the early centuries, and whose third fills the present day—that constant tendency, which I discussed at the outset, to detach the Spirit from the Word, to naturalise faith, and so to idealise Christianity as to de-historicise it. The vice of this detachment of the Spirit from the Word is that it ends by destroying its detachment from the world. Detached from the Word, the supernatural action of the Holy Spirit becomes gradually the natural evolution of the human spirit. The Spirit becomes identified with the natural humanity. A real distinction between the Spirit and the world ceases to exist, in the absence of the evangelical crisis of the Word. This detachment from the Word we have seen to be an old tendency of the spiritual life. The Gnosticism of the second century, the Spiritualism of the sixteenth, and the Protestant liberalism or Roman modernism of the twentieth all represent outcrops of the same pagan tendency to replace faith by insight, to make mere inspiration do the work of revelation; they idolise the immediate preaching and despise the objective theology (which alone provides the preacher with a gospel outside his subjectivity); they think much of the man who makes religion a treat and little of the man who makes it real and true; they gather about those who exploit God as man's great asset and neglect those who would subdue man as God's great instrument; they listen to men who urge faith with no power to produce it, and ignore those who are engrossed with a worthy and positive object of faith which alone can create it. The Reformers lived with the note of revelation, on a theology of facts; the Anabaptists with the note of inspiration, on a theology of consciousness. The one set were apostles, the other prophets. For the one the Spirit issued from the Word of gospel, for the other it wandered like the wind and was its own gospel. We shall see that, as the vice of the one was to dry into a hard orthodoxy severed from experience, the vice of the other was to deliquesce into a vagrant experience on whose bogs flitted the enticing fire-drakes of subjective whim. Each is invaluable in its own place and power. The gospel must be a kindling and present experience; but a kindling and present experience is not necessarily the gospel. It was Independency that really welded them, united and fertilised them, proclaiming a pointed and positive gospel, with a wide range for thought and comprehension in a vivid personal experience. The Christian gospel escaped from Calvinism, from the systematic creed of the Puritans, by the aid of ardent Anabaptism; but only to return for protection from its Anabaptism to the cardinal Calvinism in which it first rose. Anabaptist freedom, which has been such an invaluable servant, would have been a fatal master. But the return in men like Cromwell or Goodwin was to a Calvinism more precious for its positive evangelical centre than for its dogmatic symmetry, for its creative foundation than its closed system. Independency returned, on its native Calvinistic lines but with great new liberty, to the common faith of the Reformation; where it must always stand, or else go to dust as the mere sanctuary of every error and the consecration of every whim.

In the history of Independency itself we may mark in small the same tendencies and the same movements as we have just noted in the Church at large—the tendency especially to a creedless subjectivity—to stray in the Spirit too far from a positive base in the Word for unity or effectiveness, to lose touch with the apostolic Word and Reformation gospel, and to covet another liberty, with another Lord, who is no Lord but only hero, prophet, master, or ideal. And we shall see that the great problem of the present moment for Independency is not how to extend its action but how to re-assert its base. It is not to parade liberty, which grows thin as it grows thrasonic, but to regain that firm height and revisit that living spring whence freedom flows as sweet as mountain streams, and as irresistible as the river they make.

The influence of Anabaptism tended to carry Independency round the outside of the Reformation and give it a medieval and Catholic connection which did not exist for either Presbyterians or Methodists. And, strange as it may seem, this is one of the sources of our intellectual liberty, and our affinities with Roman modernism. That modernism is not simply a reaction and a rebound from medieval theology; it is to a large extent a development of it, of its temper and method if not of its positions. It develops those mystic and intellectualist sides which the Reformation passed by. It passed by them and their notion of freedom to seize on the ethical and evangelical release which made the true apostolicity of the Church, and which was preserved, in spite of the schoolmen, by the priest's practical contact with sin in the great penitential tradition of the Church. As often as I spoke with the late Father Tyrrell I felt that his immersion and mastery in medieval scholasticism had much to do directly with the modernism which grew upon his Jesuit days, and with his lack of sympathy for the sharp evangelical issue of the Reformers (which was due also to the debased evangelicalism that surrounded his early days). For modernism is a latter-day scholasticism, where Hegel, or some other recent philosopher, takes the normative place of Aristotle. It is intellectualism, either mystic or æsthetic in tone, and socialised by the interests of a Church or of the State. And if more people within the Congregational than, say, the Presbyterian, pale are found to be in tune with this anti-evangelical modernism, with the theological side of liberal intellectualism rather than with a liberal but positive theology, then some part of the explanation may be found in the direction I point. Leaving inferior causes on one side, it is partly due to the Anabaptist (i.e. medieval) tradition in Independency, which gives it an extra-Reformation strain, and a bias to mystic rationalism. But it is this same cause also which has happily protected it from the sympathies shown by other bodies for an ultra-evangelism; and especially from those imported evangelistic movements which are associated with a narrow Biblicism, a hard asceticism, and a type of religion with a snap action and a metallic note.

Of all the free churches Independency is least directly due to the Reformation, least bound by it, and therefore most free for it.

2. But in Anabaptism there was not only the tendency to go round the Reformation, and seek outside its evangelical liberty the inner freedom and mystic haven of those oppressed under the medieval Church. There was another principle at work, and a greater, of which it was but partly conscious, as of our true greatness we mostly are. It did something else than pick up with an ineffectual past; it cherished under its heart a mighty future. If it wedded the one it bore the other. It was the prophet, not to say the agent, of a world-future. Its inward and passionate personal religion carried consequences, once it was married to the Reformation gospel, which produced the English revolution of the modern world. So long as the inwardness was all and the form nothing, Anabaptism was ineffective, except to produce the religious subjectivity, the ineffective spiritualist egoism and sentimentalism which is not unknown in later revivals. But when that earnest inwardness was saved from its own inner weakness by union with the English genius leavened by free grace, it became the mother of public liberty in the modern world. It is true that the rights it first claimed were supposed to belong only to the regenerate, and not to the universal man, to the sect and not to society. And its freedom of belief was the Spirit's working within its own pale, it was not the mere rational liberty of the natural man. It was the freedom of the reborn not the freeborn. But such rights and such freedom had too much of the instinct of a universal gospel to stop at these narrow bounds. And through Independency they passed to create the best phase of modern liberalism. The spirit of its high calling was not tractable to the powers or principles of the old order of things. 'To every single religious community the right belonged to the free and sole disposal of its affairs. And this autonomy became the foundation of the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, which in practical form it introduced into the world.'

Liberalism never became a danger, either as theological or political, so long as it grew in the congenial soil of a positive gospel, so long as the free Spirit flowed straight from the emancipating

Word. The Reformers had this creative and regulative Word, the Anabaptists had the inspiring and kindling Spirit. The problem was to reconcile them. And it was so substantially and thoroughly done in Independency that its Church principle was carried into modern affairs. But it was not done by the direct identification of the Spirit with the reason, or the inner light with the Logos in human nature. That way lay Deism and all its train. To call in the laws of natural reason or utility to control an inner light which was the experience of a new life in the Holy Spirit—it were as if St. Paul had invited ephors or lictors to regulate the charismatic disorders in his Corinthian Church. Nothing but the Word of the Gospel has the right to order the Spirit of the Gospel, an evangelical faith to control a pneumatic.

Three things should be clearly realised. First, what I have already urged, the extent to which Independency was not only affected but made by Anabaptist influences, entering especially through Holland, and culminating in Cromwell's army. Anabaptism and Independency had in common such ideas as the Church's freedom from the State, congregational autonomy, the democratic constitution of the Church, purity of communion confined only to the regenerate, repudiation of a liturgy to give free play to the Spirit, reduction of the sacraments to symbols or pledges, and to a large extent Calvinistic dogma. The Independents represented the individualism both produced and quelled by predestination, in a combination with Anabaptist inwardness, and English self-government. When this combination took hold of the Commonwealth army the modern world was born.

Second, we should note the way in which, when these Anabaptist influences had done their work, they were rejected by Cromwell and the great Independents. By closing down, with an Anabaptist intimacy of experience not only spiritual but evangelical, on the central Reformation gospel as the touchstone of Christianity, they shed the zealots; and they at once saved historic Christianity from being lost, and Independency from sharing the fate of continental Anabaptism. 'In Cromwell Anabaptism reaches its summit; but all the same it was by Cromwell's act that Anabaptism by itself ceased to be a historical power.' He was for liberty to all Christians; but these were defined neither as creedalists nor as spiritualists, neither as legalists nor as libertines, but as people who lived the saved life of faith in the atoning Son of God. He and his great theological advisers reacted from pure spiritualism, but it was into evangelicalism, and not into confessionalism; it was into the Reformation Word of a central forgiveness and redemption as the power creative of the Christian society. On this base they aimed (too credulously at first) at a democratic franchise both in Church and State, a vital and enthusiastic inner religion, and a strict ethic. There was great freedom of conscience but none in morals, and there was room to think freely but not to live laxly. There was no effort at uniformity of doctrine. They believed for freedom's sake in firm declarations (like the Savoy) of what real Christians did believe, but not in creeds of what they must believe. They had little interest in school theology; their treatises were sermons. Their theology was not metaphysical; it was organised experience, systems of profound religious psychology. It was, so far as that experience went, a lay-religion; but it was the religion of laymen of living faith, who had passed from death to life by Christ's cross, who lived that life upon their Bible, and interpreted it in the Holy Ghost by sanctified common-sense applied to individual experience of the evangelical kind. All theology was relative and free inside that revelation in Christ which was creative of their spiritual life.

Under the rule of the 'saints' all views and denominations had been free within the pale of Christ's grace, and they insisted on moral uniformity only. Rigid theology and easy livers were both banned. Dogma was free, polity was free, only ethic was fixed in relation to the world, and, within the Church, the life of grace. But the obverse of that generous liberty was, at this stage, and in the masses of the people, something like chaos. Extravagance and fanaticism abounded. Subjective liberty came to be prized more than the gospel charter of it. Eccentricity, confusion, and even anarchy had full scope. The Levellers would level all belief as well as all status to equal value. Inspiration was personal suggestion or passing fancy. And the Bible, once the product of inspiration, now became its prey. The charismatic conditions of the time corresponded to the state of things in which each neophyte or amateur is a law to himself, with a passion and claim to urge on others whatever strikes him, and to urge it as God's latest will.

These were circumstances which made absolutely necessary some clear and positive return to a ruling and organising centre both for life and doctrine, even if it came by a dictatorship. And Cromwell was on the spot with his evangelical positivity as well as his political mastery. Neither his religion, his culture, nor his statesmanship could tolerate the zealotry and anarchy which were dissolving faith, pulverising society, threatening the universities and thereby the pulpits, and reducing the Church to a mere frantic fraternity. Could he only have done it by other than military means! We face like dangers not only without but within ourselves. But we have learned to use other means—when we are sufficiently alive to the danger to be roused to use means at all.

And, third, we must keep in view the transfer to politics of the Church principles of Independency, and especially that of the sovereignty of the democratic people, or the conversion of Independency into political liberalism. The nature of this process is well explained by Bougeaud in his Rise of Modern Democracy. It was a step fraught with enormous consequences to both Church and State—for the public a great blessing, and nothing less also to the Church, so long as it remained more sure of its bondage to Christ than of its freedom among men. When the sense of that relation to Christ fails, through a gospel diluted or displaced, where truth is lost in freedom, not only does the democracy lie open to its serious critics, from Aristotle to Montesquieu, but its moral sanative, the Church, becomes much more politicised by the State than the State becomes Christianised by the Church. To a large extent these inferior influences resurged upon the Commonwealth Independency through the army, and through the fact that it conquered by an army. No doubt an army is effective. Anybody can govern with grape-shot for a time. And then——. Let us beware of the idolatry of efficiency. It is as dangerous as the cult of incompetence. It ends in the spirit of militarism. Let us care more for a man's competency than for the efficiency of a scheme. Competent men will in the end do slow justice to a principle which a swift efficiency may wound to kill.

It is quite true that the State was looked down on by the Anabaptists. Natural justice and civil order were not yet for them invested with a right equally real with that of the religious community (however different), and equally (though differently) based on the conscience. Yet by their share in Independency they made this larger and more historic view possible. It certainly did not grow out of Reformation State Churchism. It grew from the union of Anabaptism with radical Puritanism. Puritanism corrected Anabaptist extravagances, both social and theological, while itself became much tempered by Anabaptist inwardness and liberty. It was the firm but liberal dogmatic base laid by the Calvinistic side of Independency that saved for the future the precious elements that were running to waste in Anabaptism, the absorbing personal piety, the warmth of immediate experience, the germs of modern, critical, and historical freedom, the notion of universal religion, and especially its political, social, and ecclesiastical effects. And the moral is still—beware of mere churchless, creedless enthusiasm, whether the enthusiasm of humanity or of spirituality. Beware of a mere democratic spiritualism, a popular spiritualistic pantheism, or even a simple Fatherhood, detached from a positive saving Word.

It may readily be asked here how Independency justified itself in transferring directly to civic society the social principles which ruled its Church life, and in making its high spiritual polity the law of the natural society. Were there not conditions and powers peculiar to a Christian society like the Church, which alone could ensure the due control and safe working of democratic principles? Was the Church not founded in an obedience of which natural democracy knows nothing, but which yet is freedom's moral salvation?

To that question the answers are several. We must return to the subject, but some may be given here.

In the first place, there were in those days none who did not belong to some Church, and therefore none who were quite disintegrated to Christian liberty. The nation was the Church. The time had not yet come when the nation contained a vast de-churched mass in all classes. That on the one hand.

And, on the other, Independency, here as elsewhere, did not simply take Anabaptist sectarianism and swallow it whole. It did not regard all state authority and civic life as a consequence of the Fall, and strive, by ignoring civil history and society, to return to conditions purely supralapsarian. It did not seclude itself, as the continental sects did, from its social world. It did not say there was nothing in common between the civic order and the spiritual group. It did not cherish the theology of total corruption. It had a divine justitia civilis amid the wreck of spiritual righteousness. Human nature and its laws were not pulverised by the Fall. Its constitution was not dissolved. The lex naturae was still the law of God as far as it went. Independency here followed the Reformers, who exempted from the effects of the Fall the whole region of social order. They held that what was broken was not civic righteousness but the soul's relation with God; and what was destroyed was not human nature's divine constitution, but its will and its power to set itself right with God. It retained civic order and virtue. What it had not was the power of self-salvation and of society's final and godly consummation. So that it was not a case of transferring to the public in a lump the freedom of a closed aristocratic sect, like the pure Anabaptists, but of recognising a common civil freedom as God's inalienable gift. Neither was it a case of transferring to the public the whole powers and liberties of the Church. The sovereignty of the people was their autonomy in these civil and secular affairs, and not in all. It was arrested at the threshold of the Church. It did not enter the region of the saved conscience, where Christ alone was King. The sovereign people could impose no obligation coming between the Church's conscience and its loyalty to its Saviour. So that we have the sovereignty of the people in worldly affairs, and of Christ in spiritual. And the same Christian principle as made the democracy also secluded the Church from its control as the reserve of Christ, and made it a free Church.

And, to recall the more practical and political considerations prescribed by the historical situation, it was impossible at that juncture to assert spiritual liberty without civic because of the Stuarts' fatal identification of the cause of Christianity with episcopacy, and episcopacy with monarchy. The protest therefore for a free worship and a free Church became necessarily a protest against royal prerogative in the name of the ruling people.

LECTURE V

ANABAPTISM AND INDEPENDENCY—II

To arrive at the true genius of Independency we need concern ourselves less with its early stages of Brownism, Penryism, Barrowism, etc., than with its brief blossom and creative revelation in the Commonwealth. For it is not like the Reformation movement, or the Wesleyan, or even like Christianity itself, which had their origin in one commanding and creative personality. Its earliest exponents were but harbingers of what should come rather than apostles of what had come. For instance, much early Independency was not democratic, or at least not clearly so. It was but feeling its way to democracy; and it was not clarified in this respect till after its conflict with the aristocratic Reformation in Presbyterianism. It was in the brief Commonwealth that it arrived at its true consciousness of itself, and realised its true idea. Unfortunately, while the idea was quick and powerful, the form which circumstances forced on its expression was too alien at heart to its genius to be permanent. It was too forcible, sweeping, and military. Its mood was too imperative for the minority it was. Cromwell therefore died and failed (some would say failed and died). But his spirit nevertheless passed into Independency for good and all; as Caesar, in spite of his death, or by it, made the Roman Empire, made it a Caesarism and, in its supreme Church phase, a Caesaropapism. Cromwell, a more sacred Caesar, is the Independents' man of men; meaning by Cromwell not simply the personality but all that it represented in council with men like Goodwin and Owen. From first to last, I must keep before you, Independency has pursued not a dogma but a polity based on a gospel. Its interest has not been pure doctrine through a church so much as a true church through a gospel, a true church in a true state. It has been social rather than academic. And sometimes to its cost—to its peril at least in recent times; when the social enthusiasm around it kindles this side of its native genius by such a vehement affinity that the interest of its creative truth is in danger of neglect if only crowds are won by the preaching or philanthropy which this truth inspired. It has always had that sense of the real world which was so pre-eminent in Cromwell, and it has had the consequent temptation, when its dogmatic base was shaken or dissolved, of becoming the victim of that world. Its Anabaptist and popular strain is always ready to break out; and last century, in reaction from a debased and sectarian Calvinism, that strain made it too readily accept, along with Arminian universalism, the Arminian neglect of the Holy Spirit, and its reliance only on the content of the Word acting in an ethical and impressionist way on the soul. This in turn prepared us too quickly to echo in an amateur fashion the note of theological liberalism which sounded from Germany. When Independency does lose hold of a positive gospel it is easily affected by passing gales, by sentimental philosophy in its faith, by academic criticism in its creed, and by social reform in its works, owing to the very closeness of its contact with the public. Its gospel for the people has also to save it from the people. Cromwell had, what the enthusiasts and sectaries he broke from had not, an equally deep sense of the Christian Gospel, of the public situation, and of the historic boons of civilisation and the fruits of culture. His religion was theological, as Independency has always been, but it was not directed or dominated by the theologians, except where a theological issue comes to the front and the very existence of Christianity is involved. He did not aim at a theocracy. He insisted on the freedom of the state from the control of professional religion, as well as on the freedom of religion from the official state. If the word were allowed, he aimed at a thearchy rather than a theocracy, the monarchy of God in the nation without His viceroy of a Church. It was in such ways that the Anabaptist influences modified the Calvinism on which Independency stood. Robinson was a convinced Calvinist, qualified however by much fineness of nature, much humane culture, and much contact with the religion of the Low Countries. Independency represents Calvinism humanised by much personal experience of an Anabaptist intimacy and directness; it represents Anabaptism annealed by failure, and set upon the positive base which Calvinism gave when it ceased to be doctrinaire, and its dogma was not made a public pedantry. Its religious experience was much more vivid, immediate, and individual than in Calvinism or Puritanism, but it drew enough from these to set it on a sure and steady foundation. It kept on solid, historic, and dogmatic ground, though it was not chiefly concerned with raising or guarding dogmatic fabrics upon it. It was kept concrete; and it had the power, especially through Cromwell, to shed the fantastic, the hectic, the conventicular, the apocalyptic, while it retained a note personal, evangelical, and free.

I said a little ago that Independency was more

concerned with polity than dogma, and its interest was not in pure doctrine through a church but in a true church through a gospel. That is to say, its type of religion had ceased to be medieval and was so far modern in that it was psychological and social. It was the religion of souls with a history bred in a society. It was rooted in a positive and experimental soil—in the evangelical experience, and from there it grew. The Gospel was fixed, not only as the keystone of a system but as a living genetic centre. This shows again the Anabaptist influence. It gave the theology a living soul. It set it in motion with a personal thrill. It made the theology passionate and paraenetic, as the projection and confession of a life created anew in the Holy Spirit. Its treatises were conceived, delivered, and published as sermons. Theology was not an academic science which might be pursued by a speculative calculus with comparative personal indifference; it was a transcript of personal faith, developed in a living company of saints. Its foundation was not metaphysical, but what would now be called meta-historic. It reflected the Christian psychology of a church that not only believed but habitually lived on a world-faith. The theology of Puritanism was Calvinism scholasticised at two removes, and it was as much below Calvin as Calvinism was below Independency in the matter of personal religion. It might be described by comparison as survey and specification. It was a piece of divine cartography, the result of a government survey by the Church's geodetic staff in the region of religious truth. The triangulation was well done from a fixed evangelical base. Truly there was life in the Church that produced it, but it was still life, sacred landscape in repose. There was no ferment, no stir or glow of growth, and no provision for growth. But the theology of Independency, Calvinistic as it was, was a different Calvinism from that and nearer its great source—different by all the lift, flush, and tumult of Anabaptism. It put soul upon the scene. There was wine in the bottles. There was sap in the veins. We are reminded of this when we recall that John Robinson's well-known words (to which I shall recur) about the Lord having yet more light and truth to break forth from His Holy Word were spoken by a very thorough Calvinist. But he was a Calvinist twice born. The machine became an organism. The system became vital. It was not laid out round its centre—it grew from its source. Theology (think of Owen and Goodwin) from being medieval and metaphysical became modern and psychological in spirit; though the old forms remained, a new current was sent through them, and the old fittings were used for the new force.

Theology became capable of being preached, because it was a living thing, a life's confession. Like a great epic it was first lived. It was the reflex of an intelligence not only acute and incisive but subtle, penetrative, and passionate. Theological truth was not the deposit of a school's thought but the register of the Church's intimate experience of eternal things. There is something more than Shakespearean in the dramatic majesty and passionate intimacy of some of Goodwin's pages, because they apply genius to a region of the soul above any that Shakespeare ever entered. They not only tingle, they soar; and they come home with a beauty and poignancy of spiritual truth which make them, ever after they are read, ingredients in one's own spiritual life. Some of Goodwin's passages of practical application will not only bear comparison with Jeremy Taylor, but they touch and awe and stay us more, because of their businesslike spiritual veracity and the absence of any suspicion of fine writing. I may refer, for instance, to his magnificent homiletic of Election and its unspeakable love in the eleventh and nineteenth sermons expounding Ephesians; to his stately sermon to the House of Commons on The Great Interest of States and Kingdoms; or to such moving and imaginative thought as is made to pass before us in the fourth chapter of the ninth book of his treatise on the work of the Holy Spirit. May I quote that? He there makes it a true mark of regeneration that in our repentance we are less concerned about our doom and misery, and more about the dishonour done to God who is wounded by it, and whose favour is more than life.

“Which sorrow, being for thy offence against God, so much the more increaseth by how much thou apprehendest he is pacified towards thee. And though thy heart should not apprehend so much, yet there are some relentings in it for offending Him whom thy soul loves. So as, if now the sentence of death were passed against thee, as at the latter day, and thou wert out of hope, yet, at thy doleful farewell from Him thou couldst find in thy heart to down on thy knees and ask Him forgiveness first for all the wrongs thou hast done Him.”

I will say that the pathetic sublimity, the moving grandeur of that is to me beyond all measure. Milton never made the sublime so tender as that. And the phrase of thy doleful farewell from Him, set in such a picture, since first I read it, has never ceased to glow in my memory like a jewel five words long, and to vibrate there like a motive of Schubert, or as certain tones still do of Sarah Bernhardt and Charles Kean.

And as I have named Goodwin, the apostle and high priest of our confession, I will quote one short sentence from him which has a special bearing on that living genetic manner of Christian truth which I have noted as the mark left by Anabaptism on Independent theology—that psychological quality which makes theology the process and evolution in living experience of its living gospel. He says at the end of his brief preface to his Exposition of Ephesians :—

“If Christian judgments be well and thoroughly grounded in the doctrine of God’s free grace and eternal love and redemption through Jesus Christ alone, and in the most spiritual inward operations of God’s Spirit, that will fence them against all errors.”

We have here one of many expressions of his to the effect that a theology of Christian truth is a living thing and not a closed system, a living reflex of a corporate soul fructified by the germ of experienced grace. For that grace has not to be secured in a scaffolding of extraneous philosophy but it carries within itself and its nature its own expansive power, its own organic form, and its own self-corrective principle, subduing every thought to the soul’s organic obedience to its new creator Christ. The Spirit is the living steward of the Holy Word. And to that gospel of grace, as we are continually sent forth from it, so we must continually return, to adjust our compass and take our course. From there go forth the organising surges which at once make our impulse and our law, which quicken faith and shape it, as we expand on all sides into the plerophory of Christian truth. It is more than our base, it is our source; and what issues there carries with it the free principle of its own form and its own career, whether in thought or polity.

The point I am pressing, as you perceive, is that, owing to the quick, immediate, and religious vitality which Anabaptism gave to our original Calvinism, our theology is not a fixed system we must accept but a gracious experience which we must declare, not the mould but the image of the Church's spiritual life. It therefore advances with it, but always by the power which makes a man a Christian and the Church the Church, the power of our regeneration in the grace, cross, resurrection, and Holy Spirit of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Rooted in that freedom we theologise as it compels. For it is the compulsion of a new freedom and not of a new scheme, of a final gospel and not a fixed law. We believe by the divine must of that founded liberty, and certainly we do not believe as we please. We think most freely when our first concern is to be bound to our freedom in redemption.

Thus Independency, though mothered by Ana-

baptism, was not fathered by it. It was not like Anabaptism non-resistant. It was not neutral to government. It was not apocalyptic. It was organic with the national life. But it was more concerned with a historic and national evolution than with a social programme. Plenty of Anabaptist features were found among the Independents, plenty tend from time to time to grow up among them. To-day many, like Troeltsch, would find Sebastian Franck more to their mind than Luther, others are more at home with the Quakers than with Calvin. But they do not represent the essence, idea, and genius of Independency; which truly was not itself when the dogmatic interest was supreme, yet also on the other hand belies its whole history when either spiritual or social interests produce dogmatic indifference. It is not then Cromwell's, Goodwin's, Robinson's Independency. It has lost its apostolic succession, its evangelical base, its regenerate atmosphere. It is true neither to Calvin its father nor to Anabaptism its mother. It has more of the note of that continental Socinianism which is so remarkably absent from the whole development of Independency till quite a late and decadent stage. The Antitrinitarian views of the Socini which took such a hold of the Continent in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries found but sporadic footing in England either then or for long after. Unitarianism did not become a community until after the Restoration, and then often in the modified form of Arianism. Independency did not live for dogma but it could not live without it, and it ceases to be Independency without it. It ceases to be a church. It becomes but religious clubland. It held to a dogmatic base, but without dogmatic compulsion, or a unitary institutional church exercising such compulsion. It claimed the right to emit from time to time a declaration of belief, which, however, was to be common and characteristic, and not subscriptional or coercive at the hands either of Church or of State. The State was to be Christian, but not by virtue of the establishment of an organised Church. The Church was to be Christian but not by the establishment of an organised creed. Both were to be Christian on the level base of a common Christianity, which meant an experienced faith of forgiveness through the death of the Son of God. Christianity, in a nation of such men, was to be established only by public conduct according thereto, and the manifested ethic of a life hidden with such a Christ in God. They might fall into a variety of churches, but God would save His truth in freedom, if it is His freedom, founded on obedience to His law, and especially on the prime obedience which is faith in His grace. So that Independency stood for moral rigour and dogmatic freedom on a genial evangelical base. Liberty was always on a basis of the divine authority of grace and not the mere exercise of natural right. It was on the authority and in the power of a changeless Christianity. Here was introduced the distinction, which we shall note more particularly later as associated with Baxter, between fundamentals and circumstantials. And the fundamental thing, which was the condition of all liberty within a church, was personal faith in a forgiven reconciliation through Christ's death. That was so at our source, and always it must be so, if we are not to be scattered upon all waters by all winds. Coercion was to be applied only in the matter of conduct, 'the coercion by a serious majority of a lax minority.' And Troeltsch sums up the features of the Independent programme on this base, 'Autonomy of religion and Church, political self-government by the democracy, the moral severity of Puritanism, tempered by spirituality and culture, justice made popular and courts accessible, the ruler to exercise moral and religious vigilance.' All of which, along with other features, made the experiment the first really Christian state in history—much more Christian than Geneva, though it was Geneva that made it possible. 'The rule of Cromwell's saints is the turning-point in the history of Protestantism. It is the last religious movement of a people, the end of the wars of religion, the point of departure for the modern world.' Social forces, political and economic, were here freed from religious control, and made independent of direct connection with spiritual developments. They became rational in base and standard. Ethic, while Christian in ideal and temper, was put on a natural footing. Toleration was established in principle in the public realm, and it was soon to claim a more questionable place as an unlimited comprehension within the Church. Independency became the parent, as it has since been the protagonist, of civil liberalism. It believed that every soul, being created by a Christian God for redemption, was Christian in its destiny; that it had therefore a right to Christian liberties, and especially the right to be free for everything necessary to the exercise and growth of a Christian personality in society. This Christian personality was the greatest thing in man, the greatest asset of a people, the greatest interest of all policy. It was the greatest stake that any man could hold in the country; and it made the peer's real stake just equal to the peasant's in a society thus moralised. Each could stake in the nation no more than the soul or person, for whose uses all property or place was valuable. To evolve this moral soul was the object of society and its laws, the purpose and course of God's world.

Thus an Independency based on the soul's predestination and nurtured in a spiritual experience has been carried from the predestination of some to the predestination of all. It has gradually replaced a predestination by power with a predestination by love. It made a reality of our predestination in Christ and the Christ of Humanity. Such religious views affected greatly the purpose and the range of predestination, and they were bound to have political effect. And the political effect was the liberalism of the modern world. True it has gone far from its base in very many cases, and forgotten or disowned the Bethel where God gave it its career. The assurance of the saint's soul has become the mere individualism of the natural ego, or the mere altruism which is sympathetically concerned for other egos, apart from a purpose of God with either. As a German puts it in his cumbrous but effective way, 'The subjectivity of religious Independency becomes the subjectivism of the modern citizen.' Inwardness becomes egoism. The political interest has often submerged the ecclesiastical, and even the evangelical. So that ardent Nonconformists and politicians, of culture in some kinds, may be found denouncing and despising that great creator of the liberties of the modern world, Calvin, in a way that shows how completely historic knowledge and spiritual insight have been eclipsed by the mere order of the parliamentary day.

But modern Independents are apt to be driven into politics, first, because they have nothing in their church life to satisfy the political instinct which is so strong both in human nature and in their own tradition. They have no part in a great organisation that can do things, like a connectional church. This is the case of many a village pastor who eats his soul out in a poverty of practical opportunity, if he do not secularise it in local politics. And, in the next place, because they are led to think that Christianity has a direct political ethic; whereas its direct action is to create a moral soul, and thus a social or national ethos, which then creates the public ethic. It is too easy on both sides to identify one political form with ethical Christianity. There is no political form directly given by Christianity. Christ laid down no political ethic. He gave no theory or structure of the true State, with a divine right. Yet the Christian gospel does involve an ethic, social in its very nature as a kingdom, which contributes much and powerfully, and at the far end decisively, to political ethic. Christianity has much to do with politics. But it does not follow that it must do it directly, through the Church, or especially the Church's ministers. It is a fallacy, which misleads many, to suppose that Christianity is a divine republication of the lex naturae in a spiritualised form which is a divine charter of natural rights. That way lies much spiritual legalism, and the capture of the free churches by a subtle erastianism.

It has been the misfortune of Independency to have suffered in greater or less measure from the liberalism it created, whether political or theological. Not indeed that it should be less liberal, but that it should be less the victim of its liberalism. It has sometimes cared more for freedom than for the truth that makes free—even to calling the care for such truth reactionary.¹ It has in cases become more interested in liberalism than in the Gospel. It has often at least acquired insight into the one more keenly and deeply than into the other. More of its members understand election issues than gauge the Lord's controversy. The old religious individualism, reared under our Election by

God, has given way to secular constructions of liberty, which were but the natural man enlarged, mere democratic ideas of equality, and a genial notion of fraternity. The communion of saints is practically meaningless to many who are devotees of the brotherhood of man. The undoubted right to live, the sound right to the means of living, takes the place once held by the duty of glorifying God in life and life's occasions. With the retreat of the idea of predestination has come the assertion of a free career. And we have liberalism rather co-existing with Christian principles in the same mind than flowing from them. Often it is no more than theistic, often not that. It rests (it has been said) on a notion that the human units, equipped with certain rights and qualities, exist in a natural and pre-established harmony which we must make actual, a harmony like that of the physical atoms in the mechanical philosophy. The dogmatic base, from which this public liberalism first sprang, is replaced by a natural base, which Christianity does not create but only reissues in a new edition, permissu superiorum. The law of nature is not based on the Bible, but on natural religion of the Stoic fur; the Bible is interpreted by that rather than that by the Bible; and everything in the Bible, or even in the Gospel, which traverses that or limits it is ruled out. That is to say, liberalism ceases to be a religious principle and becomes a social philosophy. It is less a Christian product than a political ethic held by Christian men. But it captures religious thought as well as rules political; and it pervades faith, as I have said, with a subtle erastianism, which saturates and weakens even the grounds of liberationist protest against the erastianism of the obvious kind. The welfare of the individual or of the people not only is pursued, as it must be, but it takes the place once held by the glory and purpose of God; and society is organised for the one without much apparent reference to the other. Hobbes, Locke, and Adam Smith have, to an extent which I do not venture to measure, taken the place of Cromwell or Milton—except on religious platforms. The inviolable freedom of the individual takes the place once kept for his absolute dependence and obedience before God.

All this is the inevitable consequence of the popularising of a great principle. Its facilities are prized by more than appreciate its fountain or its force. It is not for a moment said here that the faith which made liberalism is extinguished by its creature. But it is certainly obscured or postponed in the case of many of the protagonists (especially the younger) of our public life. And no one would say that it was as operative in the recent decapitation of the peers¹ as it was in the decapitation of the king. It is not easy to see how it could be. If such things are done by religion, it needs a very powerful and sublime type of religion. It required 'the last of the Heroisms' in its time. And that is impossible at this moment, amid the unsettlement or collapse of positive faith. Liberalism in politics has the solemn note taken out of it by liberalism in belief, by the theological liberalism or nescience which kills a generous theology.

Here also, in the matter of belief, native and individual liberty takes the place of divine vocation; which was not simply a release but a redemption and a regeneration. We have seen how predestination, from being a theological doctrine in Puritanism, became in Independency a personal certainty of immense religious enthusiasm, and that largely through Anabaptism, through an obsession by the Spirit at the cost of the Word. But this meant in due course that faith became mere inspiration, which went on to take the lead of revelation. The Bible ceased to be read only in the light of an inspiration which created it, and it was brought to the bar of the inspiration it creates. It was read, not in the light of a revelation given once for all, but of one which flashes in momentarily, impulsively, even explosively, upon the pious soul. That momentary illumination might or might not agree with the Bible. Mostly at first it did, because the personal inspiration was kindled by it. But at least it put the Bible in a new position, and one strange to most of the Reformers. It did not interpret it by a principle drawn from it, but by the light it struck on the soul—as if to-day the Christian littérateur were a sounder expositor of Christianity than the saintly theologian. So also the Church, ceasing to be a miraculous institution which God made once for all, became a voluntary corporation which man makes from time to time in his Christian freedom and democratic faith, for worship and work. Instead of one church and one truth there were churches many and views many. Hence the relation of Church to State became a question of quite a new colour. Is it to be parity, preference, or neutrality, the establishment of all churches, of one, or of none? Both Lutherism and Calvinism have been overruled by the Anabaptism they persecuted. Their objective gospel fell a prey to subjective illumination. People believed only what they felt did them good, and as far as they felt it. They were impatient of everything but edification, especially impatient of talk about redemption or regeneration. And then the subjectivism moved from the religious to the rational. The supernatural spiritualism of Münzer, Karlstadt, and Schwenkfeld passed into the natural and rational of Franck, Denk, Weigel, and modern liberalism. The illumination of the Quaker became the rationalism of the Aufklärung. The inner light took a harder and more natural phase.

And now the great struggle of our time in this region must be to recover for the Bible Word the positive and final authority it has parted with to natural religion in more or less rarefied forms. To the Bible as the Reformers read it we can never, indeed, return. And the Bible of the illuminationist is at best an edification, it is not a revelation. Means must be found of placing the Gospel, which is the Bible's core and life, in the place which the infallible Book once held; and of securing it in authority over the popular subjectivism by which the churches must fade into spiritual egoism, religious sentiment, rational anarchy, and moral impotence. A theology of the great fact must replace a theology of the mere spirit of Christ. That is the task of modern evangelicalism, to rescue from the Bible its positive and final gospel.

PARTICULAR ANABAPTIST FEATURES IN INDEPENDENCY

I HAVE been trying to impress upon you that the element differentiating Independency from Puritanism and Presbyterianism was neither theological on the one hand, nor ecclesiastical on the other. It was neither dogma nor polity in chief. It was a religious difference—spiritual and social, enthusiastic and democratic. It was the element that went to its extreme, on the one side, in the Quakers, and, on the other, in the Levellers. It was, in a word, the Anabaptist element, with its supremacy of the inner light and of the direct note, of the unwritten word and the popular rule. We are well provided with histories of English Nonconformity.¹ But they are apt to leave us too insular. They do not place Independency in the context of the great Church, nor do they always grasp its true and creative work for the modern State throughout the West. It is provincial Christianity still, with a certain patois, as dear as the accent of a village

Bethel, but yet a patois. Even when we are made to feel our spiritual work for the nation we do not realise it for history. And we do not always reflect the national note. We do not envisage Independency in the whole context of the Reformation age, or of the world's course either backwards or forward. We treat it as coming too directly from the Reformers, or rising too wholly indigenous to England, or as too wholly confined in its effects to England or America. And indeed the whole purview of the historians of Independency has regarded it too much as a piece of English history, or the history of English religion, and too little as an organic part of the spiritual history of the West. The function of Holland in particular, as our chief nexus with continental influences, is not grasped. It is too accidental with us, as if it were no more than a city of refuge, where we learned nothing and forgot nothing, instead of a spiritual school, where the masters spoke the word of the martyred saints, and Anabaptism taught as one risen from the dead.

Forgive me if I pick up previous allusions to this newer point and extend them. The influence of Holland on Puritanism had already been very great. Its type of Protestantism was Calvinist. But it was Calvinism sanctified by the great struggle with Spain, and taught public wisdom by the Cromwell of Holland, William the Silent. Our second Cromwell owed much to the first. Part of that public and reasonable wisdom was toleration. And in Holland therefore the fugitive Anabaptists (chiefly known there as Mennonites) had their liberty and their influence. What I have not said already refers first to the immense number of English who lived in Holland during the seventeenth century, either permanently, as merchants, or for a time in military service. They were much impressed with the ideas of the Dutch Republic, which, in all the interests of civilisation, was then the centre of Europe, and probably two centuries ahead of the rest of it. And I refer, secondly, to the great influence of the Dutch upon our Puritanism through the refugees from Spanish rule, who had flooded the eastern counties with a type of Protestant faith specially high-minded, seeing that they came not for gain but for religious liberty, seeking in England that which Englishmen before long had to seek still farther west in America. It is computed that no fewer than fifty to seventy thousand such heads of families sought shelter in England at this time, and made the whole region between Lincoln, Norwich, and London the chief seat of a Puritanism whose impress is still conspicuous there. The influence continued, and was increased, when the tide turned, when William had beaten Alva, set up the tolerance of the Dutch Republic, and opened a refuge for the English Separatists (who, being plebeian, were treated with so much more rigour than the middle-class Puritans). These Separatists were naturally much drawn to the Mennonites, who were indeed, by their refugees, in all probability the real begetters of Brownism. At any rate more than half the population of Norwich, where Browne had charge of a congregation, was composed of fugitives from the Low Countries engaged in manufactures, as Douglas Campbell points out in his fascinating book, The Puritan in Holland, England, and America (two vols., Harper, 1898). It was inevitable that the rudiments of English Independency should be much influenced, if not indeed aroused, by these highly spiritual people, with their faith in the local church, their conception of the Church as a voluntary corporation instead of an imperative institution, and their principle of the separation of Church and State.

It is quite true, nevertheless, that Independency was not simply Anabaptism in resurrection. That would be more true of the Baptists and the Quakers. Fox expounded Mennonitism,¹ and Penn had a

Dutch mother. The extremest tenets of Anabaptism, however, Independency shook off when its lesson had been learned. But if Independency (always including the Baptists) alone gave true effect to the material principle of Reformation faith, and won for it a form congenial to its own inner nature it was (ironically enough) by the aid of those Anabaptist inspirations which the Reformers sought to extirpate.

There are three features in Independency which we may examine in this light.

1. Its theological liberty ;
2. Its inwardness and spirituality, what would by some be called its subjectivity ;
3. Its chiliastic element.

1. Independency took faith in popular earnest. The Reformation was not a popular movement. It promised to be, but it was not. By its definition of faith it should have been, but it was not. Nor was it so religious in the mass as in its greatest leaders. It was too easily captured by the ruling political powers. This may have been a historical necessity. Rome, as I have already said, might have regained the whole field but for the German princes who were secured at such a cost. But this only means that another movement had to supplement the practical work of the first Reformers for their own original idea, and give it its native scope.

It was in England that this justice was done to faith, and it was done by the aid of that power latent in Anabaptism which the Reformers renounced.

There are, in a matter so great as faith, so deep, high, and wide, three features, with three far-reaching effects. There is its theology, its sociology, and its religion; its effect on truth as a doctrine, on society as a church, and on the soul as a power and experience.

(1) In respect of the first, its teaching, we have seen that Independency did not have dogma for a prime interest. It did not cultivate schools of scientific doctrine. It did not do so much there as even German Anabaptism did. It was English not only in that it was free and self-governing, but also in that it was selective and cautious in what it took from the Anabaptist creed. It was not affected, except sporadically, by the Unitarian aspects of the inner light and the present Word. In so far as it was theological it was so either systematically, in the way of borrowing from Calvin (with Owen and Robinson), or experimentally, in making Christianity the plastic experience of Christ's atoning redemption (Cromwell and Goodwin). And it is in keeping with this priority of interests other than dogmatic, that Independency has been associated with so much theological liberty upon the evangelical base, not of Biblicism, but of Biblical positivism.

We should be very clear that however theological the tradition of Independency has been, especially in the decadence of the eighteenth century, its genius or its métier has never been theological science, but theological positivity. It has run to preaching rather than thought; and the defect of this quality is that it stands the impressionist risk of succumbing to a preaching personality at the cost of preached truth. Its note has not been theological system but theological footing, not an ordered knowledge of divine procedure but an experienced certainty of divine redemption. Hence its freedom is not the unchartered liberty of science, the culture of absolutely disinterested truth (for saving truth can never be disinterested); nor is it the application within the Church of the unlimited toleration which becomes the State. But it is such liberty of thought as grows from an evangelical foundation, consists with apostolic finality, and unfolds the wealth of that new infinite world. It is not made of Adullamites but Israelites. And it is not, by its genius or history, a theological Alsatia among the other churches, which would mean ceasing to be a church at all, and becoming a popular laboratory of religious inquiry, which would turn a good church into a bad university.

(2) It was upon the second and third elements of faith that Independency chiefly seized. It drew the true inference from Reformation faith in respect of church polity. It strove to organise the Church on the basis of the personal faith of the community, on its confession of the Gospel, and not of a system or creed. Its church was not an institution but a corporation. It began where Christianity began, in a divinely given fact of gospel, and not in an analysis of the religious consciousness. And it would give faith scope to organise itself by its native powers and affinities, without such an arrest and deflection as the Roman Empire laid upon faith's youth in the Catholic Church. It may be observed that this plastic action of faith still goes on in the movement for the federation of the Free Churches, which seeks to realise the unity of the great Church, not by resumption under a miraculous historic institution, but by free combination as voluntary corporations.

(3) So we come to faith as an experience, faith in its inwardness.

2. The most distinctive feature of Independency, as it came to itself, arose in connection with faith's action upon the soul. It was its inwardness, its spirituality, its prophetism, which involved free address both to man in preaching and to God in prayer. This subjectivity has been among the most persistent of all its features, even leading to unhappy extremes, especially in the exclusion of anything liturgical in worship, in the exaggeration, not to say idolatry, of preaching, and the temptation even to sacrifice Gospel truth to the preaching aptitude and its prompt success with crowds. It has not always escaped the democratic peril which postpones the love of truth to the culture of individuality, and is more interested in temperament than in salvation.

The first Independents, it has been remarked, were known as 'believers'; in Cromwell's time they had come to call themselves 'saints.' The Ironside army was the army of the saints. It is a pity the word has fallen into disuse, for it expresses a great thing both historically and experimentally. It certainly indicates the differentia which gave Independency its own triumphant line. It expressed the fact that faith was so inward, spiritual, ardent, and personal that it became inspiration. Independency became the religion of prophetism. Like the old prophets it cherished dreams and programmes which never were, or could be, realised; but these only covered with a temporary hull the real, new, and vital power that emerged. It is as easy to despise the chiliasts and sectaries that haunted the precincts of the Commonwealth as to ridicule the poor Anabaptists of an earlier day abroad. But ridicule and contempt are mostly misplaced, except as Christ spent them on the 'leaven of that fox Herod,' i.e. for pretentious incompetency in high place. They are a mistake in connection with deep spiritual movements. And there is a great deal in the chiliasts and fantastics of the seventeenth century which makes a most valuable parallel and commentary on the prophets of Israel, their method and entourage, as well as on the prophets of the first Church, till these last were put to school under the evangelical control that Paul expended so wisely on his Corinthians. The root of the great matter still worked mightily in these strange exponents of the Spirit. And the fanatics of Independency had that in them which, when anchored on the historic gospel, purified by action, and schooled by the genius of great realists like Cromwell, made Independency the world-power in history which Puritanism was too theological to become.

Faith turns here to be an inspiration instead of a mere assent, or even a conviction—an inspiration for the Christian layman instead of capital for the official theologian. That was the principle which Anabaptism contributed to English religion through Independency—the living Spirit, separate from the world but intimate with the Word; yet not merely alongside the historic Word, and not above it. Even

Milton wandered into saying that it was above it, for poetic genius chafes at history as restraint, and has more affinity for a free Spirit than a saving Word. Milton sacrificed Word to Spirit and it made an Arian of him. But Independency meant the living Spirit on the foundation of the historic Word, and issuing through it. And the historic Word was not Christ as the mystic Logos of spiritual Humanity, sparkling in every soul (which was the Quaker line), but Christ as the saving action and grace of God for a new Humanity at an eternal and creative point in history for our reconciliation and regeneration. Such liberty, on such fixity, was the note of Independency when it settled from its early ferment and found its true soul. Out of all the fanciful forms it took in its vagrant youth this emerges as the Independent principle of the classic time—the realisation of the soul's redeemed life in its true, personal, and predestined spirituality, the immediacy of that life, the autonomy of it, the tremendous, overwhelming, incomparable reality of it, and, above all, of the revelation which created it. Bunyan and Cromwell are at one as representatives of this genius of faith, this promotion of Puritan conviction to Independent enthusiasm, this exaltation, this moralising, of the conviction of truth to become the conviction of sin and grace. The self-occupation with which the Pilgrim's Progress has been charged is the first stage of self-conquest; and it is a far higher thing than the self-engrossment of so many geniuses who have even preached the altruistic gospel. I need but name Schopenhauer, to say nothing of a cloud of those musicians whom he regarded as the apostles of the only gospel left us; which, after all, like everything æsthetic, is a mere lenitive to the soul that tastes a dismal fate. The whole of that Commonwealth ferment of enthusiasm was so profoundly based on the faith and sense of the new creation that it was full also of the sense of a quite new social world which through it should come to pass. And it did come to pass, though (here again like old prophecy) not in the shape of their often fantastic dreams. The central principles of Independency did remake history. They made the modern political world. They made a world-power of the liberty which Holland had only made a world example. And they did it on the moral basis of a conscience regenerate in Christ alone.

This enthusiasm of the inner light went far in some cases to dissolve Protestant, and even Christian, belief; especially in the absence of a real dogmatic interest, or a guiding declaration of Church belief. The fine and gifted Unitarian, John James Taylor, in his History of Religion in England (p. 165, second edition), says of the Quakers, among whom, as among the Anabaptists, all the modern heresies seem then to have had much course: 'It may be questioned whether their principle of renouncing all external guidance, and of throwing each man on the suggestions of his own spirit, might not issue, if it were tried on a large scale, in raising up at last, from the sheer necessity of the case, some great sacerdotal authority to guide the aimless and fluctuating mass of minds. Such a sense of intellectual helplessness as would probably result is the very condition which the Catholic priesthood would most desire for the promotion of its own views.' Many fine things were said, true so far as they went, and said with special force at such a time. They were said with much more force and relevancy than they would have now, when we have learned their lesson, and it has awakened us to a different need. This, for instance, from Francis White (1649): 'Religion is not a name but a thing, not a form but a power, not a notion but a substance divine. Religion is properly that inward power in the soul of a man whereby he believeth and is bound to God in righteousness and holiness. So much of this power as a man hath so much religion. Where there is none of this power there is no religion.'

But Christianity is not mere religion and not mere inwardness, it is faith; and when mere inwardness becomes the religion of an atomic mass, when it is enthroned by their spiritual imagination above all that is outward or historic, there is no limit to the fantasies it may produce. It acquires all the vices of the religious autodidact. It becomes indifferent to the providential powers and personalities of the past; and, being proudly ignorant of historic movements and thought, it treats its own finds as original discoveries, without knowing how long they have been dead and buried and transcended. Mysticism always tends to ignore active history and social faith. It is immediate and individualist. It knows but of the action of the Spirit, not of a Church of the Spirit. It tends to become a temerarious spiritualism. Its history becomes the quest of spiritual adventure instead of a discovery of the unsearchable riches of Christ. It sails by no star, and it boxes the compass of the creeds, till it is captured drifting, and towed into port by a cruiser of Rome. Christ becomes but a prophet, who met the prophet's usual fate at Jerusalem. He was not spiritual enough to be the prophet for our day that He was for His own. He was a passing symbol of the Spirit and not God's last Word. All Bible history is but a spiritual allegory for use in edification. The voices and suggestions that shake unlettered peasants to-day may be of equal value with the Word that came to elect Apostles. The amateur theologies of the Bible-reader are on the same footing of authority as those of the apostolic Bible-maker. Both are but tentative interpretations of some ineffable experience. The Spirit in the present takes precedence of any Word from the past.

We are familiar still with this anti-apostolic succession. It is mentioned here that we may remind ourselves how, at the outset, Independency had to work its way through such things to come to its own (as Christianity itself, in a like ferment, had to find itself through the chaos of Gnosticism); how it had to clarify and settle; how it had to gather in upon a historic gospel in order to secure its own historic place and influence. All these recurrent eccentricities and abuses of freedom are but extreme expressions of that principle of inwardness which is so precious but by itself so futile, a strand so precious but so precarious as a rope. They show how the religious subjectivity, which in the original Brownist Independency was used but as a base for the constitutional autonomy of the single Church, became in the next stage of the sectaries the principle of faith and the spiritual life altogether. And they prepare us for the next stage after that, when they had to be taken in hand, and reduced to their proper and useful place under some principle and gospel more objective and positive, able to quell the despotism of a clergy or a church, and yet to erect a living centre both of power and guidance for the free Church and the free soul.

8. The third feature of Independency was its chiliasm. And it is continuous to-day in our inveterate and optimistic belief in the imminence of the great and final social age. We have cast off the apocalyptic hulls of the Commonwealth period, and we are clothed in economics and a right mind. But the passion remains. We do not expect to see Christ descend in clouds, but we are very sure of a great and revolutionary Christian future for mankind not indefinitely remote. Some are even surer of a Christian future than of the Christian past. But on the whole it is the sign of a great and not a decadent age. Some of the most powerful and pregnant periods in history have teemed with these ideas, which, however Utopian their forms, have an optimism which belongs to the greatness of faith. It has been happily said that the chiliastic form in such cases is but the minute-hand upon the dial of time; while it is the hours that we must chiefly regard. We cannot read a great believer, saint, and theologian like Goodwin, with his public mind, without feeling how deep in him and his time was the presentiment of a huge new departure in the world's history.¹ Nor can we look back from now to then without feeling how just the soul of that boding was. God tells His secrets, if not always His tactics, to His servants these prophets. They have the intuition and the inspiration, and the secret, if not the machinery, of a great emancipation for the world. Their other-worldliness was also a mighty inner-worldliness. They had l'au delà intérieur. They feel the thrill along the line of God. They forefeel the stirrings of the great democratic age, charged equally with possibility and with peril for the kingdom of God, but never out of His long leash. For was not the foundation of the people's sovereignty the self-government, under Him, of His own people in a Church? To this they were always driven back. For, though a Milton or a Roger Williams came to a pitch that they would have every man serve God by himself alone, without any church at all, these were extremes due to the situation of the time. And in so far as they were but ideas they were not adopted as the Independent principle; which after all arose to lay prime stress not on the independency of either the member or the minister but of the Church; and on the autonomy of the Church as the moral and spiritual sanative for the sovereignty of the people always.

It was not therefore the Reformation that put an actual end to medievalism but Anabaptism, as Troeltsch says. And it did so, not by itself—but by itself it was an ineffectual thing—but by the share it had in creating the positive Independency which changed the political history of the West and the future. Medievalism did not end, therefore, till the fruits of the English Revolution were secured for good in the affairs of civilised nations. This was indeed the watershed of two worlds for both Church and State. The State became neutral to the Church, though not to religion. The Church ceased to be miraculous as an institution, though it did not cease to be, in its nature, as miraculous as grace, or the action of its Holy Spirit. Church and State thus became separate, and each therefore more free to be itself for the benefit of the other. Organised religion sat more loosely to civilisation—to the great increase of their mutual influence. The one Christian life was recognised as growing into a great variety of types. And the outcome of that has been the end of one imperial Church and the promise of a great federated Church. Collaterally there has come the downfall of one grand dogmatic system, and the cessation even of such an ideal. There is no infallible system. System is not the manner of the soul's relation to God. Revelation has ceased to be primarily a thing of proposition and statement, a scheme of intellectual truth, a piece of knowledge in the noetic sense of that word. It has therefore dropped the ambition of intellectual unity as a postulate, and it courts it only in a scientific way as a product and an approximation. A system of truth can no more command the whole of life on its modern scale. So also vanishes the idea of State and Church as two aspects or organs of one religious civilisation in a parity. They have each a different origin, spirit, and genius, close as their relations may be. They are not two verbs with one nominative, two actions of the same subject, two functions of one body. The new era meant a variety of different beliefs and communities, with the free right of each to convert itself from a minority to a majority. And, as a great unitary and imperial Church became impossible, so also fell the idea of civilisation as one Empire of the old centralised type. Imperialism, so far as it exists at all, must exist by free federation, through ties of blood, tradition, and sentiment, deeper, more flexible, and yet more tenacious than organisation from a despotic centre. In State as in Church the great unities become those of action of spirit, of faith, of sympathy; the ties of a common country, or a common humanity, or a common and experienced gospel, within which there is much variety of life and entire freedom of conscience.

To have been the prime agent in the achievement of such results is the chief glory of evangelical Independency and the revolution it created. Before the days of either the Illumination or the French Revolution this creative idea was afloat and at work upon the political world. And within the Church these Anabaptist principles destroyed the scholasticism of decadent Protestantism, the Indian summer of medievalism in seventeenth-century orthodoxy, and they opened the kingdom of heaven to all hearty believers.

Outwardly the Independency that gave birth to these transforming powers died in the act. After the Commonwealth and the Revolution it ceased to be a world power, or a power in the great Church. It became isolated even within the insularity of England. It had revolutionised the policy of the world, but failed as a polity to convert England and become a constitutional majority. It had failed to organise the State upon its model of absolute freedom in the Church. The hasty attempt to transfer the idea of religious autonomy directly to political affairs came to grief in anarchy; for the one had an authority latent in it and the other had not. The failure was not the fault of the idea but the vice of the time. Cromwell himself realised that. England was not far enough advanced morally to accept by a majority the principles forced on it by the army of a moral minority. And Cromwell could not secure the liberty he had set on its deathless way. Step by step he had to restore the old forms, as he could not destroy the nation's fear of a freedom established by force. The Puritans were not many, and the Independents were fewer still. The army was a 'vigorous dwarf,' which could not overcome the lazy good nature of the English giant. It was the army not the nation that slew the king; and the nation replaced him by another king. But a new world was begun nevertheless with England's lead. Even Tiberius and Caligula could not extinguish the spirit of Caesar, or quench the world hegemony of Rome; the genius of Caesar took new life in the Church of Rome. And so here. The Commonwealth idea could never retire from history. But it had to fashion, through time and experiment, its own political form. Freedom does not mean the same thing in religion as in politics. It has different postulates in each case, and a different ethic. A State polity cannot rest on Christian ethic till the State is composed of regenerated Christian men. And the only thing that can make public freedom safe at last is its control by the freedom of the soul in its most private, intimate, and final relation with God in Christ. The development of freedom is a slow process of adjusting the law of natural society to the Christian idea, and securing permanence for the cohesive instincts of human nature by the supernatural unity of its re-creation in the Son of God.

LECTURE VII

THE LIMITS AND DANGERS OF THE ANABAPTIST ELEMENT IN INDEPENDENCY

I HAVE said that the failure of Independency in the Commonwealth was really a premature triumph, and was due to the vices of England rather than the nature of the experiment. At least modern England had been founded by it, especially her commerce and her sea power. And the idea of the sovereign people had been planted never again to wither, though for long to grow but slowly. What had secured the triumph was the Anabaptist affinity in Calvinism, its prophetism, that side of predestination which insulates the single soul in direct dependence on God, casts it, as even Calvin did not, upon its immediate experiences, at the cost perhaps of history and tradition (including often Scripture), and develops the inner light with its revelation straight from God, too regardless sometimes of mediation by the past. It was on the strength of this inner and individual inspiration that Cromwell presented himself as God's chosen ruler; and he appealed to men who believed too much in such messages to challenge his claim when made with such inward and outward power. It was thus that he at once crowned Anabaptism in the success, and ended it in the collapse, of his experiment. And, apart from Cromwell, this sufficiency of the inner light, this exaggeration of one side of predestination, was tending to destroy the other element of Calvinism—the solidarity of the community, resting upon an objective Word, positive, creative, and historic. Cromwell himself had to fall back on this feature for his definition of the Christians who were to have the freedom of Church and State. And that was but one of the signs how much practical men felt the need of a definite base and an objective control for the ultra-spiritualism and rationalism which ran riot then in the name of the Spirit's liberty. To-day in like manner we speak of the spirit of Christ, which may mean no more than a theological Agnosticism or indifference, sentimentally or ethically Christlike; and we need a similar objective control. Cromwell could not impose on England or its Church that positive faith in which he found his own footing, and therefore he could not save his programme for want of the condition that works it. Anabaptism, detached from an evangelical base, ended in sentimental deism or rationalist mysticism, in a humane unitarianism or such a humane spiritualism as forms the note of much current religion. And it always must do so if it do not take its rise and stand in a historic revelation appropriated in evangelical experience. Mysticism we must have if we are to have Christianity; but it must be the mysticism of history and not simply of the soul, the mystery of God manifest in the flesh and not of the soul on God's breast. The notable point is that spiritualism became effective and valuable only in England, and only on a predestinarian and evangelical base. And even in England it was ready to fail, and it took the power of a very Cromwell to save it, when the predestinarian subjectivity was severed from the evangelical base, and the spiritualist egoism broke loose from a positive revelation. The Church dissolves, and its effect on freedom is lost for the State, when it ceases to be evangelical in the great apostolic and Reformation sense of being regenerate by the cross of the risen Christ.

This unchartered spiritualism had dissolved a historic Church, and it was on the point of dissolving the historic State, had Cromwell not taken it in hand, and used it to establish a dictatorship. That only showed how essential a historic and continuous constitution was, and how that constitution in English history could wear none but the monarchical form. In Church, as in State, religious republicanism had failed for the hour, both in its aristocratic or presbyterian form, and in its democratic or independent. Both reverted to the principle of monarchy, personal in Cromwell, constitutional in William III. But it was monarchy now and for ever elective by the sovereign people. That was the revolution made for good and all by Independency, in spite of its first hasty error in transferring to the masses of the England that then was the constitution of its picked people in a church. And hasty it was, and Utopian; it was too credulous of human nature, thus to identify off-hand Christian rights with natural freedom, as if democracy were but the civic side of Christianity, or Christianity the religious side of democracy. One is reminded of the error of the States General in France in 1789 which, in their idealism, energy, sincerity, and reasonableness, Acton calls 'the most memorable of all political assemblies.' But, he says, 'their one error was that, having put the nation in the place of the Crown, they invested it with the same unlicensed power, raising no security, and no remedy, against oppression from below, assuming or believing that a government truly representing the people could do no wrong—as if no barriers were needed against the nation.' Cromwell truly had the authority of the Gospel behind his people. Their rule was not unlicensed. Where he and his were mistaken was as to the extent to which the people at large practically owned that authority. But if the attempt was premature, and in much fatal, it did not kill the idea. The institutional Commonwealth fell, but its influence as a principle has been enduring and commanding. It did open the way for the emancipation of natural rights, of political freedom, and of the personality of the State, from ecclesiastical and theological control. And it thus set up the prior condition for Christianising them all through, by the creation of a free Christian ethos bound to take public effect in collective political conduct.

The whole Calvinistic ethic was worldly in the best sense as compared with the Lutheran. It had a world-policy where Lutheranism had but a bourgeoisie. And it was a Cromwell made, on this side of him, by Calvinism that became, what Gardiner calls him, the founder of England's material and commercial development. He was the translator of the best public ethic of the Reformation, i.e. of the world, into modern history. It was thus English Independency, and not the aristocratic republicanism of Geneva, that made Calvinism the formative power of the new world. It was in the struggle of Independency that the issue was settled between monarchy of the continental type and monarchy of the constitutional, between old monarchy and the monarchy of the new world, as the form in which public right receives its best and safest scope. Amid the dissolution of the medieval order with its supernatural controls and securities, it has been a diffused, modified, but mighty Calvinism—a Puritanism far more than theological—that has supplied, however sub-consciously, the staying and ruling power of the new order. It began in Holland, culminated in England, and expanded in America on a vast scale, which greatly affected even the French Revolution and every state in Europe. For an hour Cromwell succeeded, with an army which tried ‘to set up a bran new fabric on ground levelled by revolution.’ But an army even of saints (we have seen) cannot make a State, as soldiers do not make statesmen. Yet it closed one age, opened another, and made a future. It was the first and greatest attempt in history up to its date to incarnate a truly Christian idea of the State; and it failed but as incarnations do fail—only the more widely to conquer. The idea was started on a career which could not be stayed. What was done could never be as if it had never been. And its motive power was radical religion—ethical and spiritual, individual and intimate; and that meant radical politics—though all in an evolutionary and constitutional way in the long event. The autonomy of the religious community, we have seen, was bound to affect sympathetically the political community. Toleration arrived and was bound to pass into equality, and finally into justice to all churches by the complete detachment of Church and State as organised bodies. The political autonomy of the people is the inevitable, though not always the direct, result of this religion; and (leaving the question of what is meant by the people) it is the only line on which a truly Christian State is possible. And it was Independence, in spite of its miscarriage, that both showed and opened this way. The Reformation came there to its great and true public self; whose renunciation has been a blight on its Low Church champions that no pietism makes good. England served herself heir to the new moral discovery, by virtue of that appropriative and practical genius which makes her often slower than the ideologue nations, but more permanently effective for their ideas; which ideas would otherwise but beat their wings in vain, seeking entrance on political reality, as the venerable idea of a free people had done for two millenniums. Christian faith must always aim at a Christian State and Christian politics, even if the Church is not the lever, and not the loom, but only the power-house in their manufacture. The idea of a Christian State must always remain as real and powerful as it was in the Middle Ages.

Only it is a State made Christian, not by organic connection with the Church, but by the moral effect of the Church's gospel, working through the personal faith of Christian citizens, and massing that experience in a social tone and a public policy. If the Nonconformist conscience is sometimes below its own ideal, the Independent conscience has been the mightiest of historic powers in the modern world. Democracy is safe only as Christian democracy. And the Christianity of democracy is not according to its theological belief (which is indeed a vast matter, but the concern of a church) but according to its personal religion and its public conduct of affairs.

Calvinism (it has been seen) through its predestination doctrine, gave a valuable point of attachment to Anabaptist spiritualism, but it was not captured by it. As the positive protestantism in our Independent genius, Calvinism kept itself above Anabaptism in such matters as positive belief, a cohesive church, an organised state, and the right of war. Independency did pass through a Tolstoian stage in the early ferment of the Commonwealth. It is in a Tolstoian stage now in some respects. If Quakerism be defined (on the lines of Barclay's Apology) as the last and purest form of the spiritualistic movement, finely rationalist in its theology, and comparatively indifferent to the elements of dogma, of symbol, and of history in Christianity, cherishing a Christianity of practical piety in the form of enthusiastic spirituality and social sympathy, discarding sacraments and living by the inner light, then it might be said that Quakerism, if not growing in numbers, has so grown in influence as to have affected much of our Independency to-day. But Independency is not Tolstoian, it is not Quaker, it is not quietist, not illuminationist in its genius and history. In Tolstoism, whether as politics or doctrine, it dissolves, as it was dissolving when Cromwell saved it. It is much more than a refurbished Anabaptism, an unchartered spiritualism, a boundless subjectivity, a promiscuous liberty. Its religion is not spirituality but faith. And its polity is not sheer autonomy, which, unless it is the autonomy of a final, controlling, and social Gospel, always dies into atomism and anarchy. Such individualism is but an intrusion and repetition in religion of the political idea of personal right and independence—that helpless thing which a religion is there not to repeat, but to subdue, control, and fructify. The interest of Independency is not so much the autonomy of the Church, far less of the individual, but of the positive Word and Holy Spirit; nor is it the freedom of the pulpit, but of the Gospel. Its enemy is not an organised church, but a discrowned and deflated gospel. To do no more than transfer natural independence to the Christian religion is to bleed the Church to death. It is to disintegrate it in a narrow, fanatical, and remorseless veracity. And it is to leave the soul to egoism, faith to subjectivism, and the State to anarchy. Religion can afford to be individual and autonomous within the Christian pale, because there a positive Gospel has a social subduing and regulative power on the soul singled out for freedom. And it is thus essentially different from the natural right to liberty, which has not in itself the secret of its own control. The methods of the one cannot be transferred to the other. And the lesson of the Commonwealth's failure is that we should keep them distinct, though not insulated. The error of that great time is the error of many still. For we are not enough influenced by history; which we tend to regard as a museum and not as a school, or as a field where we sowed the wild oats of our past and not the seed of our future. The Commonwealth failed by treating England as a Christian nation in the same sense as its church was a Christian church; and it tried to regulate the unprepared people accordingly, by direct and even forcible insistence on Christian ethic. The natural Christianity which it repudiated in its creed it postulated in its politics. And the event showed the effect to be as fatal in practice as the belief said it was false in theology. The Christian should be rigorist in his own personal ethic; but a rigorism enforced on public practice is fatal, till the Cross of Christ is established in all hearts; then it forces itself. Human nature and society has a law of its own in the divine economy, with an evolutionary logic which cannot be arrested by any Christian barrage. It can only be turned by a long, slow, and gentle curve, engineered by a faith which has something more than an ideal eagerness, which has the practical sense and art of a situation.

This discovery represents the evolution undergone by Cromwell's own mind. The point came with him, as with Luther, when he had to break with the spiritualistic part of his supporters. The year 1658 was for the one what 1525 was for the other—the rupture with the ultra-radical and atomic elements, and the reaction to a certain conservatism bound up with a historic salvation, whether in belief or affairs, common to the first century and the sixteenth. By the same discipline Independency is learning to suspect direct political pressure, and to respect moral permeation. Sudden conversion is impossible with a modern State, which is no longer the clan and retinue that adopts the religion of its chief. And forced conversions are avenged in violent reactions and restorations. Enthusiasm must not in public matters despise opportunism. Idealism is impracticable, and can even be bloody, if it is so fanatic that it feels degraded by compromise and an instalment system. The kingdom of God still works by an elect and its radio-activity. The most encyclopedic idealism lives but in a little world and sect if it think to force its cosmic range upon the belief or practice of the great public. Even Christian discipline itself may become in this way a principle of anarchy, as, conversely, Christian liberty may destroy Christian truth. In the name of the Spirit men may cast loose from all revelation which controls either thought or life, all revelation outside their own visions, truths, or feelings. Revelation may go down, trodden under foot by a crowd of revelations out of hand. And then the field is open for any dictator, who will be pope or pagan according to circumstances.

It remains to be seen how far Independency can yet serve the great cause and idea it infused into the world. To-day we are all being forced out of our insulation into a vivid, and even organic, cosmopolitanism. The compression of the earth by the extensions of communication means a great expansion of the ecumenical, the humanitarian, idea, if we but rightly rise to it. Both the nation and the Church are being forced into the career and concert of Humanity. For the Church at least this means a call for a Humanitarian Gospel. But that does not necessarily mean a popular gospel, though it does mean a public. A puritan gospel of moral and intellectual thoroughness cannot be promptly popular. It does not mean a gospel of mere sympathy, but one which assures the moral destiny of Humanity on all the absolute security of God. And that again does not intend an ideal destiny for mankind to which destiny God is but the supreme means. Such a view would make God tributary to man. But it means a great dénouement of the Human Tragedy in the Divine Drama—a Gospel in which man with his tragedy and sin does more to glorify a saving God than with his achievement he does credit to a helping God. It means that we do not move from the Gospel which gave to Anabaptist liberty and subjectivity its only stability, and fixed its spirit in the Word. But it means also that we so re-read that gospel as to keep it still at the moral centre of the new world which it has done most to create. We have in places lost something of that gospel's faith and enthusiasm. We are tempted to seek a liberty which is independent of it, and even critical of it. But we should be perfectly clear in our mind that such a liberty is but a relapse into the short, atomic, and suicidal Anabaptism which already we found so good a servant but so ruinous a master. It is not our first call to wait upon the liberties of a natural democracy, but to descend on it, and to provide it with a freedom which alone can secure these in permanence and safety.

In one way the Toleration Act was a calamity to Independency. It gave it only a right within the State and not to the State. It excluded it from all national office and responsibility. Worst of all it shut it out from the universities and the universal note. It gave it a freedom only to be small free. It helped to make it oppidan, conventicular, seminarist. It drove it in upon itself, to cultivate in religion a family piety, and in theology a provincial creed. Being compelled to be non-national it became creedal. Secluded from the great national issues it was thrown upon its traditional theology, without the great inspiration of that theology's origin, or the generous corrective of public affairs. From this period date most of the elaborate Calvinistic trust-deeds, which now give so much trouble (where they are not neglected by consent), because they seem to have been constructed rather to stop holes against heresy than, like every act of true worship, to make a great confession in face of the world. The Anabaptist element quite disappeared, both as energy of spirit and freedom of thought. In the matter of belief the eighteenth century is not a time of which Independency need be extravagantly proud. It was devoted to orthodoxy, and orthodoxy whose architecture was of a late, debased, and perpendicular type. Naturally it was Calvinistic, but it was Calvinism with high sides rather than high summits, Calvinism often with a lid on and the air exhausted, the Calvinism of the lesser minds and the lay pieties, Calvinism devoid of the grand note it had in Calvin and Edwards. It was Calvinism without the atmosphere of the great tradition of Church and State, which gave an amplitude to theology, and kept it close to history on the one hand and to the Gospel experience on the other. We are all familiar with the different utterance of one of the greatest Independents and most thorough Calvinists of the previous century, John Robinson. He said in his final charge: 'The Lord hath yet more light and truth to break forth from His Holy Word.' There is nothing startling in this to those who know the spacious times of the great Reformers. Calvin himself might have said it with his large manner and his liberal exegesis. It is quite impossible in reading the context to suppose that it means no more than Dexter tries to make it mean—changes and modifications in Church government. It meant theology not polity. Robinson was saying no more than many of the Independents who avowed the Anabaptist influence had already said when he went on: 'The Lutherans could not be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw; for whatever part of God's will he had farther imparted and revealed to Calvin—they will rather die than embrace it. And so also the Calvinists—they stick where he left them. A misery much to be lamented. For though they were precious shining lights in their times, yet God hath not revealed His whole will unto them. And were they now living they would be as ready and willing to embrace farther light as that they had received.' He then referred them to their Church covenant: 'Whereby we promise and covenant with God, and one with another, to receive whatsoever light and truth shall be made known to us from His written Word.'

Dexter is much more valuable in research than in interpretation. It is not easily intelligible how words like these should be thought by anybody to mean no more than modifications of Church polity. But the most significant thing about these words (which unfortunately we only have at second hand) is the appeal from all theology and all orthodoxy to the Word of Gospel, and the advice constantly to verify the reference. 'Ad fontes.' Back to living sources and saving facts. We find the note in all the great documents and occasions of the Reformation, in the Confessions, in the Savoy Declaration, and even in the Solemn League and Covenant, where the reference to orthodox truth is quite subordinate to the reference to the Word. The eighteenth century lost that reference out of its practical procedure, however it may have held it in theory. And the nineteenth showed the inevitable reaction and even revolution. The stiff orthodoxy of the eighteenth century was followed by the sentimental heterodoxy of the nineteenth, and the critical heresy of the twentieth. And it may be hoped that in the twentieth also the pendulum will drop to rest in the Eternal Centre, and we shall recover upon a new base of positive faith and critical freedom, well found in soul-stuff, brain-stuff, and food-stuff. That base of course cannot be the Bible understood as infallible, but the Bible as the shrine of the Gospel. And our methods must be adjusted to that great change. But the fountain of the free Spirit must still be the Word of the Gospel breaking into a thousand heavenly lights, yet working as the positive act and power to change the race from death to life.

Our reaction of the nineteenth century came partly by spiritual infection from the evangelical movement outside, and partly from the necessities of the mind itself, especially under the illuminationist influences of scientific thought. This reaction grew mightily under Coleridgean and Broad Church auspices. Mackennal says that Maurice had more effect on Congregationalism than on his own Church. It was at least a different influence. In his own church his influence has moved to High Churchism—he was always suspicious of the Broad. But with Independency it worked the other way. It made at first a generation not rationally but evangelically broad; with a Vermittlungstheologie which represents a genial effort similar to the attempts to offer a Harmony of the Gospels in the face of modern criticism. But that only prepared the way for a Broad Churchism which unhappily laid much less stress on the churchism than on the breadth, and followed continental criticism more closely than evangelical theology. It also fell under the close of the Romantic movement, and was far too much dependent on literary religion, as represented by names like Tennyson, Browning, MacDonald, and their various dilutions. Sympathy took the place of conviction. The passion for liberty of belief rose to a great height, partly at first because Independency was so sure of its evangelical base. The old Anabaptist temper broke out in this liberal direction with a force in some cases extreme. It found its opportunity in the state of theological education in the colleges of forty or fifty years ago. And it attracted the younger end of the lay mind in particular. It threatened to become detached from a historic Word and an evangelical Gospel in a practical mysticism and philanthropic religiosity which was more natural than supernatural, more sympathetic than sure, and more rational than positive, keen for effect and indifferent to truth. The ministry on the whole was sound (though sometimes bewildered), because it is kept in closer contact than the active young laymen with the soul's deep need and guilt. Independency is indeed a lay religion, and its ministry is in principle a lay ministry. But in practice the ministry is set apart by two things—by the necessity for handling the Bible, and the duty of ministering it to the actual soul whose confidences it receives. The layman is in Christian contact with wrong and reform rather than with sin and salvation. He is a pragmatist. And he is apt to forget, in his practical impatience and his instincts of immediacy, what the ministry has constantly to face—that the conscience is more than life, the soul more than the heart, holiness more than pity, and moral growth much slower than civilised progress. Till that is realised an impatience of theology is apt to drive the lay mind into sympathy with a spiritualism whose shining but shallow breadth is fatal at last to revelation, because negligent of the historic Word and the apostolic truth. Christianity is a lay religion. But it is so because it turns upon a universal priesthood rather than a simple sonship. The Fatherhood of God sans phrase is not Christianity, nor is the native sonship of man. We cannot have too much lay agency so long as it is the agent of a mediatorial religion and not simply of a kind fatherhood, of a redemptive and not simply a benignant grace. Our Independency is once more called on to do what Cromwell's did, and to shed the sectaries of an absolute rational independence, whose naïve ideal is an uncharted freedom with spiritual instincts, a sentimental or subjective religion with a theological Agnosticism. Independency can never give up its theological liberty. And creedal completeness, pure doctrine, is not its ambition. But it does feel, and it shows in this time of stress that it feels, what its history records—the necessity of founding its libertarian enthusiasm on a positive gospel, and securing its freedom on a revelation whose root is elsewhere than in the mobile soul of an individual, or an age. We can but end in wreck if we have more wind in our sails than ballast in our hold, more passion than pilotage, and more way upon us than steering power.

Allusion was made a little ago to our exclusion from the national universities, and to the inadequate training which, up till recently, was given in the colleges that so wonderfully rose to make that misfortune good. It was a deep and deadly policy that strove to neutralise the Toleration Act by cutting the root of the nerves which kept our mind alive. It was truly and malignantly thought that if we were prevented from having an educated ministry we should need no more toleration than the dead. To a considerable extent that policy was thwarted by the resource with which small academies sprang up round the more able and commanding ministers. The culture there given would be very inadequate now, but it was not far behind the culture of that age, and often commanded its respect. Then the enemy took the farther step of enacting that these seminaries should be closed—a provision which, for various reasons, never came to the effect it intended. But valuable as the work was which these schools of the prophets did, and marvellous as those colleges came to be which grew out of them by the generosity of far-seeing and spiritually minded laymen,¹ nothing could compensate for the seclusion of the education of the chief teachers of the public from the intellectual fountains of the national life. It will be long before the stamp of that misfortune on our treatment of truth and affairs is lost.

But a new day dawned when, in 1836, London, as the first of the new universities, opened a degree to all without respect of creed; as also when in 1871 the abolition of tests at the old universities admitted our youth, though not our ministry, to their culture. But, valuable as these opportunities have been, they have not been pure gain. Access to the old universities has lost to us by attraction many whom we should gladly have kept. And the effect of London University on our ministry was at the very first a mixed benefit. As there was no divinity degree, and most of our postulants for the ministry do not yet come to our colleges equipped with the Arts degree, students were unhappily allowed and encouraged to devote the whole or the best of their college time to its acquisition. The result was in some cases that they went out to their charge with one or more good, and even brilliant, degrees, and much knowledge in everything but the matter of theology which it was their first business to handle in their profession. They were unschooled in theological method, and in the order of philosophy which properly belongs to it (which has not ruled at London University). Added to this, the type of theology offered by such prelections as they did attend was not always of a commanding, or even of a formative, kind in many cases. It was of the nature described by Dr. Dale in his somewhat contemptuous comparison of the Union's Declaration of Faith in 1882 with the massive Savoy Declaration (Dale's Life, Book vi. ch. iv.). It was moderate Calvinism, immoderately diluted, and set in a somewhat amateur philosophy. The ablest students therefore were well disciplined in secular regions of minor value for their proper work, and less well equipped to handle the real theological problems of the hour. Their intellectual respect and even enthusiasm was sometimes preoccupied by secular knowledge and rationalist methods, in a way whose worst fruits we see in the results of the same education in India. And they imbibed what in a few cases was a Philistine contempt for the rational value of their own religion in comparison with its sentimental side. Some were tempted to bestow the training they had on a criticism of their faith's traditional form, instead of an exploration of its mighty content. They were sometimes graduates in useless science and amateurs in necessary theology. They respected Mill, loved Tennyson, and trounced Calvin. Some few had to pick up as they could, during the first years of their ministry, when the mind's first plasticity had been pre-engaged for other methods, such theology as they acquired; and then sometimes it was by mere reading rather than study, which left them much at the mercy of current, and even weekly, literature. When it is remembered also that the chief concern of their life was preaching, and preaching of a kind that must attract the public; farther that their relation to their people might be based on mutual sympathy rather than a common salvation; it will be realised that their views sometimes grew up in an atmosphere of impressionism, which left them still more at the mercy of the Zeitgeist, when they should have been provided with a culture that commands it, and that can come from a deep and ample Christian theology alone, with a belief of fulness and not simply of point.

But within the last generation a great change has taken place, and one that will mean very much for the future both of the ministry and the Church. More than twenty years ago Springhill College, Birmingham, became Mansfield College, Oxford, under the one powerful teacher¹ among us whose theology had the cosmopolitan note. And then in 1900 London University was converted from a mere examining body to be a teaching body also. A theological faculty was also set up, which was composed, as to a moiety, from the theological schools of London Nonconformity. And, above all, a degree was instituted in theology. The example of London was followed by Manchester University, and will doubtless be followed by the other new universities wherever they are in the midst of theological colleges numerous enough to form a group of schools and a faculty. The student for the ministry can now therefore have the university stamp and training in the very subject with which his life has to do. The courses are adjusted accordingly. Both the teaching and the study are obliged to rise to university standard. Our colleges never were so staffed and so efficient as they have now become. They have never had such a competent and cosmopolitan note in their subject. Their teachers are among the first in the land. The student has himself to blame if he pass into the chaos of the age without a chart or compass. And there is hope that Christian truth will return into the stewardship of men as competent, and even massive, in their grasp of it as those giants were who made us, and who were as great apostles as they were powerful theologians. In the matter of faithfulness and devotion ready to be duly guided, we were never more rich than to-day. And amid all the confusion and stridency of the time it is much that Independency should be still as evangelical in its note as it strives to be adequate in its creed.

But in this connection it is not to be denied that we have difficulties in our own household. The colleges of Independency should be its pride. They alone enable the churches to meet the first claim on a church—the adequate preaching of the Word to a world. And no church has more reason to be proud of what its elect members have done in the way of making good our exclusion from the national universities. But I say its elect members, not the Independent churches as such. The colleges are private trusts, of which Independency has the unspeakable and gratuitous benefit. They were founded and endowed by private men or groups, not by the churches, and they are not controlled by organised Independency, which has all the benefit and none of the burden. The churches are in the unsatisfactory position of receiving their trained ministry as a charity. The subscriptions from churches are insignificant, the interest is small, though the provision and maintenance of a ministry is the Church's very first charge. The Independent churches, speaking generally, are not sufficiently alive to either their treasure or their duty in the colleges. And though the Congregational Union, led by the ministers, legislates more and more for a ministry duly trained, there are symptoms surviving of that indifference to a professional culture which alarmed Cromwell and his friends. Such culture forms what might be called the reserve power of the ministry and its 'second wind.' There are those who would be content that the ministry should pass through no more than a Bible Institute, if only it can preach in the sense of immediate impression on crowds. Some seem even to look for more from the preacher than from his Word. It is an outbreak of the old Anabaptist spirit detached from the Reformation Word, or fallen into a pleasant pietism.

The Anabaptist strain in our double origin is in several ways very persistent in our history. Its subjectivism tends to sacrifice evangelical religion to temperamental or rational. I have indicated how it has broken out on the rational side as a protest against theological certainty, and for a truth which is but what every man troweth. I have hinted, farther, how on the enthusiastic side it broke out, through a somewhat crusted soil, in sympathy with the great evangelical movement, and with the Broad Church movement on its evangelical side. I have spoken of its enthusiastic readiness to consider and absorb the spiritualistic movements of the age. And we have the same trait emerging in the indifference of some of our people to a trained ministry for the future, if only the preacher is momentarily or subjectively effective in the present. They tend to think that a sound training damps the spirit, as Christian ethic chilled the negro camp-meeting. They are apt to forget that the Church is itself the great preacher, and to sink to providing a mere pulpit, or even a springboard, for the preacher. The Church is in danger of being exploited by the preacher rather than served. In the small churches this is a serious difficulty, as they are apt to fall a prey to illiterate but fervid speakers, whom they invite to their oversight, and thus foist into the stated ministry. Against this risk the Congregational Union has had to legislate. And even the larger churches sometimes are less apt to be impressed by what is competently said than by how it is agreeably said. They are apt to respond to piety rather than to faith, to the interesting rather than the strong, to the magnetic rather than the apostolic. Effectual calling is lost in effective. It is the hour of immediacy, mobility, and impressionism. The immediate, the edifying note of the mystic prophet for groups is apt to be more welcome than the regenerative note of the positive apostle for the world. The Church may be sacrificed to the audience. What prospers a congregation may be more regarded than what makes and builds up a church. What interests monied men for its activities may mean more to it than what writes souls in the book of life. All this is a phase of the spiritualistic note detached from the apostolic Word, or the effective severed from the evangelical. The passion of spiritualistic Humanitarianism tends to displace the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, the power of the Incarnation, and the act of redemption. Some would even find in such consecrated words as these only the debris of dead theology; and, if their ministers needed any training at all beyond an Arts degree, they would rather have them taught economics, sociology, pedagogy, literature, and, perhaps, first aid. Only the extreme people, of course, would put their wishes in such terms, but it is no exaggeration to say that the evangelical type which holds the hour is the simple, soothing, winsome, and helpful, rather than the convincing, convicting, converting, and creative. And the order of speech most welcome is that of the gracious hierophant rather than that of the searching seer; the speech of sorrow, sympathy, healing, rapt hope, and spiritual beauty, rather than of sin, righteousness, judgment, saving faith, and God's supreme glory. It is the Catholic note of the beatific vision rather than the evangelical note of the kingdom of God. Its note is æsthetic rather than ethic, the beauty of holiness rather than the power of grace.

If the ministry craved for is so temperamental rather than evangelical, this, I am urging, is a phase of our old Anabaptism ; it is against that adequate training of the ministry which tells most powerfully when the flush of young ardour has subsided ; tells as a reserve, and makes a man a rock and not a reed. For to reach the region where the Gospel's creative and staying power resides means much labour, patience, and pain, as well as vigour and joy ; but to utter one's own spiritual personality need not cost much—till the Nemesis arrive for coining the soul to the public instead of rightly dividing the word of truth.

Yet the feminist weakness I speak of, and the danger (for it is no more), is only part of the price we must pay for the much-needed humanising of faith. What our truth loses in the greatness of Puritan imagination it gains, to an extent at least, in sympathetic contact. We get nearer men, even if we do not always come to them from nearer God. The Gospel sits down beside them, and brings a cheer which was often lacking to the mightier truth. Of the two extremes who would not prefer that of nineteenth-century sympathy and alertness to eighteenth-century orthodoxy ? The disciples, who loved Christ and failed Him, were yet nearer Him than correct Judaism. And they became apostles, which even genial Judaism never did. Religion, indeed, is not Christ's just because it is genial. There was little genial about either Him or his greatest adjutant. But geniality is the under surface of a holy love which promises more than the harsh veracity of critic or cynic. Christianity is not indeed the religion of the heart but of the conscience, and humanising means moralising ; but the Christian way to the conscience lies oftener through the loving heart than the able head. And all the acuteness of the mind does not penetrate and subdue the soul like the subtlety of the spirit which believes and therefore loves. The point is that the love which stays and which tells is not our natural sympathies turned on divine things, but the fruit of a supernatural change in which the heart is remade by the Spirit through faith in the Word. The natural affections are not made Christian by being turned on Christ, as art is not made religious by painting saints. What we have to do with is the gracious affections, which spring up when Christ is turned upon us, turned with a searching and saving power from whose piercing light nothing is hid. That love does not grow in a night ; it is not temperamental ; it is the product of much experience of life, much study of the Word, much spiritual severity, much toil of sacrifice, much despair of self, much repentance under grace, much incense beaten small and cast on the consuming fire, much silence beneath the peace of God. 'That thou mayest remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more, because of thy shame, when I am pacified toward thee for all thou hast done, saith the Lord God.' To be silenced thus, to dwell on our salvation till it silence us thus, is a first condition of sacred eloquence, and death to sacred rhetoric. It is a frame that is not cultivated by fluent and facile religion. But it makes stammering lips and struggling thought more sacramental than gliding streams. His voice is as the sound of many waters—which do not sound except they fall and break.

The political ardours and the theological extravagances sometimes associated with the Anabaptist side of Independency are efforts on its part, tentative and empirical but dimly conscious of its own right way, to replace itself in the great world-stream of action and belief, to emerge from the orthodox conventicism into which it was partly forced and partly fell, and to reintegrate itself into the great Church, the great democracy, and the world's thought. It is an instinct quite inevitable in any church that knows it has a world-gospel, and knows the world that needs it. No great rediscovery of the Gospel has ever aimed at a mere repristination of its grasp by a previous age. Luther, for instance, did not just tumble into his contemporary world with a vehement iteration of New Testament themes. He condensed in his own person the moral problems special to that age and to the generations before it; he did not simply throw a gospel in their face in a Low Church way. Because that was not how his gospel struck him. It did not smite him in the face, it got to his actual moral case, pricked and converted him in his heart, him as he actually was, him as generations made him, him the medieval man with the age's quest raging in his soul. The Gospel acted on him experimentally, and this was the badge and seed of the new time. The old answer was fitted to the new problem psychologically. It was adjusted to the conditions created for the conscience by all the generations that had developed the Church's unrest around him. The questions that Luther answered with his gospel were not first century questions any more than twentieth. They were medieval questions. And the Reformation answered them by a gospel and a principle adjusted to them with such intimate and telling knowledge that in the long run it dissolved medievalism without surrendering its own specific power for the future.

It is the like thing we must do to-day. We cannot answer the questions of a monistic and immanental age like our own with the medieval idea of God—a God to whose transcendency the world was optional or accidental, and one of several equally possible. We cannot answer questions about revelation in the same way as was done by our Independent fathers to whom the Bible was identical with the Word of God. But the answer is still and always to be made by the same Gospel as the apostles preached as the intimate power of God for redemption. From that foundation Independency can never depart. Its history has had, and can have, no other ground for its firm, flexible, and permanent freedom. No idealism has the secret of permanence as a freedom. Like all culture it sweeps round to dictation and dogmatism, to sets and cliques. Freedom is the product of a gospel and not of a culture. We have to repeat Luther's method, in another plane and climate, but with the same Gospel. It is claptrap to glorify the heroism of our fathers if we have lost their source of courage, and their power to fit positive and permanent Christianity to the new time. Heroics without such power are but the stage bravura of futility. And yet our fitness for the time is not, any more than Luther's, to be measured by the extent to which we can present social panaceas, avert or quell the wars of hard taskmasters and infuriated peasants, or provide Utopias for Mr. Bernard Shaw. How shall man be just with God? When the wage question is settled there will still remain that question of sin's wage, which the Church's Gospel came chiefly to take in hand, and to recast society from a new centre. That is where the Church has its positive, creative note. Beyond all our protests against abuses and anachronisms it is there, in the conscience, that we have to justify our existence, and speak the divine Word. Let us take steps to be sure of ourselves there. Which means that we win a new certainty and depth in our gospel; so that we are sure, not with the iron certainty of a truth which has rusted into its place, nor the wooden idolatry of a God wooden too, but with the vital power of a creative principle. To give Independency new confidence in itself and its genius, to restore power to its pulpit and conviction to its pews, to cast off its present soft apparel and put on the armour of God, we must care less for liberty and more for that which makes and keeps it. Independency must remember, first, that it means a real Church of the Holy Spirit; second, that it is built on the one foundation of the Church and source of the Spirit—repentance toward God and faith in Jesus Christ as sole Lord and Saviour; third, that its internal freedom both in thought and act is secured to it as a church by that redemptive, creative foundation alone; fourth, that its first social service is due therefore to the great apostolic Church of the Spirit, and especially to the uniting of all the churches, with a relative independence, on the one evangelical spiritual base; and, fifth, that it must exercise the true Church's effect on public affairs for the sake of the kingdom of God. It is impossible that Independency should ever lose a commanding interest in public affairs. It would be a misfortune, and a fatal one, if it did. And its genius lies in political affairs rather than social. Only let us not think that our public value is to be measured by our popular favour. And let politics in their party form be kept from entering and exploiting the churches as churches, engrossing their interest, and prescribing their methods. It is churchmen that should be politicians and not churches. In this respect the churches have to avoid the fatal extremes of the Commonwealth on the one hand and the eighteenth century on the other, and to breed Christian politicians without becoming political institutions like an Established Church. Let us beware of the political establishment of a disestablished Church.

190 FAITH, FREEDOM, AND THE FUTURE

LIBERTY AND AUTHORITY IN INDEPENDENCY

HAVE we not arrived at a time when the question whether Congregationalism is worth preserving, or has a future, must be placed on a new basis?

Our fathers were brought up in an age when it was held that Independency was the true polity because it was the polity of the New Testament Church. But we have discovered (or it has been discovered for us) that the state of things in the New Testament, while it was neither Episcopacy nor Presbytery, was something very different from our Independency. And even had it not been different, we now take a different attitude to it. We think the polity then is not necessarily the polity now, that what was inevitable for church life in the first century need not be equally valuable for the twentieth, that no polity has divine right, that several are equally useful according to circumstances, and therefore equally divine.

But when that has been admitted, upon the word 'useful' the farther question rises at once, useful for what? And the reply has been forthcoming with much enthusiasm—useful for human liberty, or equality, or fraternity, for the ideas and purposes of democracy. Congregationalism was declared to be in the nature of a democracy, and so to be democracy's congenial form of church. And the democratic idea included the liberty and development of the individual, together with the growth and progress of the community and ultimately of humanity. Christianity was the enthusiasm of humanity endowed with a divine charter. And no doubt this was a great and needful stage in the onward upward march. But not only have we become somewhat disillusioned about the individualist democracy, as Mr. Hobhouse's book¹ shows, not only are we somewhat concerned about its claim to entire autonomy, and not only are we less sure about the kind of humanity which forms the democracy's enthusiastic ideal; we ask another question. Passing by the doubt whether a church gathered about a King can be a real democracy, we ask whether the Gospel is there for the uses of the democracy or the democracy for the uses of the Gospel, whether it invites mankind to exploit God or to glorify Him. We observe that the democracy will recognise no authority but what it creates, the Church none but what creates it; and the collision is sharp. We ask whether the tribunes of democracy really mean that we should transfer to it the claim made for itself by the Roman Church—that it not only serves the kingdom of God but that it is that kingdom, and is therefore the grand rival of Rome for the reversion of history. It occurs to many to question if democratic liberty, fraternity, and equality are the be-all and end-all of moral humanity; to ask where place is left in that list of rights for duty, and especially for man's first duty of obedience with heart and soul and strength and mind. They note that the higher, and finer, the more original and pioneer the issue, the more likely mere majorities are to be wrong; that Christ gave no sign that He came to set up a final and millennial state of democratic liberty; that He was chiefly concerned with something which had an eternal right to rule and use liberty of every kind; and that if political liberty could ever be finally shown to be incompatible with His ideal, purpose, and action, then political liberty must go down, like every other natural instinct or ambition similarly incompatible. It is remembered also that it was in no idea of political democracy or individualism that Congregationalism took its historic rise, but in an obedience to Jesus Christ in the face of all the powers or majorities around it. It was the mother of political democracy and freedom, but not its child.

A modification of the democratic plea for our existence is put forward when it is said that we exist for 'social service.' I have suggested that our tradition and genius are more political than social. But in so far as it is true that we exist for that social end, it is equally true for the Church in all forms; and it is not easy to see what ground it gives for our separate existence, especially considering the advantages in this direction possessed by more highly organised bodies with more immediate prestige. The movement for social service by the Church of our time is one of the greatest. It corresponds to the evangelical movement of one hundred years ago, of which indeed it is largely a fruit. But if it is put forward as the ground for the existence of any church, or its title to public respect, it still seems to make the Church valuable chiefly for its service to the kingdom of man rather than God. And the note of many Christian people who are engrossed with this idea is the treatment of Christ as its greatest asset rather than its Lord and God, its most powerful force rather than its Life and King. Truly, the Gospel is social or nothing. It came as the salvation of a historic world. The grand unit it confronts is a world. It at once created a Church, which is its first social charge. Its first charge is its own society, the new society which it is its nature directly and inevitably to create—the Church. The service of man is but its second charge, through the first. The first social work of the Gospel is to make and cherish its own society of the worshipping Church, and to keep that first; and then to serve and bless man with all the collective resource that such a society alone has because it is full to overflowing with faith, and love, and power. It does not look well when that social service seems to be prudently adopted by the Church (like the newly discovered right of the parent in education) rather than inspired and irresistible. It would be a false position, and the source of much futility in our effort and influence on society, if ever social service were prominently associated with indifference to Church or belief, if it were even treated as a substitute for evangelical solidarity, as an anodyne for an inner spiritual void, or a means to cover or recover a lapsed faith. The Church is something more than a co-operative society dealing in social welfare. Yet nowhere else is the secret of social welfare. Far be it from me to disparage, or to reduce by one, the philanthropic or social services of the Church to general society. The Church is not doing too much for society, if it were doing the right things. It is not doing nearly what it could. But one chief reason is that it has in many cases become more concerned about the society it would serve than the society it is; more concerned about man's welfare than about God's condition of it, and His provision for it, and especially His social provision of a Church made by a real gospel in which the journals have no interest. The Gospel must do more than it now does to socialise our churches after the inward man before they can do God's social service to the world. There must be more spiritual, more evangelical solidarity. We are not doing what we should for society because we are not turning out in sufficient numbers people whose first social ardour is for their church and its trust from God. We are not for society what we should be because the Church is not the society it should be; and Christian men are not compelled and equipped in it to act on society as such citizens should, as churchly citizens alone can. The extensive action of the Church suffers chiefly from over neglect of the intensive. This is as true for its home effect as for its foreign missions. The great social action of the Church is not to bring pressure to bear on the State quâ Church; but, by becoming the great home and nursery of the only social inspiration that really masters egoism, it has to produce such Christian citizens as must and will combine to apply the direct pressure required. The Church has a far greater action to exert on society than its ministers can have. It touches and moulds many things which its pulpits should not. Whenever direct pressure has to be applied we enter party politics; and the great variety of opinion on party and other lines breaks up the volume of solidarity in the Church; where something more valuable for reform than even reform itself is generated, where the social soul is created, the social unity rallied, the social inspiration fed. And such direct pressure is therefore better applied by leagues formed for the purpose, whose first and express object it should be, than by the standing society of the Church, which has for its first charge the moral and spiritual solidarity of faith. Spiritual solidarity means more in the end for social effect, social reform and progress, than does any social programme. And a church saturated with spiritual love of the brethren in a common faith is the true focus or hearth of that love of the neighbour which is the moral condition of social eugenic.

Dislodged therefore from its final ground in the New Testament practice and in social utility, Congregationalism is driven back to ask what distinctive ground remains to it. It has done a great work, one of the greatest of historic works—it has given birth to modern democracy. Is that not enough for one sect to have done? Might it not consider that it should retire from the stage, like Israel when it had produced Christianity?

What has it done since? To that question there is a twofold answer. It inaugurated modern missions (especially in its Baptist branch), and it was the backbone of municipal and local public life. But allowing for these things the inquiry persists. What is it equipped to do in a modern world? For what does it still exist? Why should it be cherished still by modern-minded men who realise the problems both of the present and the future and yet believe? Why should it be served and believed in by the best men and the strongest? What does it confess in a distinctive way? To what does it give effect?

To religious liberty, it will promptly be said by many. Now I have already indicated what was meant by religious liberty among the sons of the Reformation. Its prime sense with Luther and all his train was not freedom among men but freedom before God. It was not freedom to hold any religion or none, but the freedom which was religious or nothing, the freedom which was identical with Christianity, freedom not of action or opinion but of soul. Forgive me if I repeat anything in trying to be explicit on a point so great.

There is a religious liberty which is the child of our Independency, and there is one which is its parent. There is our freedom among men for God begotten by our freedom in God for men. In a like way when we speak of political freedom we may mean one or both of two things. We may mean freedom in the State from an individual, or freedom from the State for an individual. We may mean the freedom of all the citizens from a ruler who is despotic, however benevolent; so that each man has his responsible place and right in the ordered State as a whole. Or we may mean freedom for each individual from the interference even of a free and republican State in the region of his thought, conscience, or faith. It is this latter—the laicity of the State—that is the great product of the Reformation; and it goes on to disestablish the Church everywhere. It goes on to secure the State's ecclesiastical neutrality, and to place the establishment of Christianity in the ethicising of its politics alone, and the production of a Christian ethos as the national spirit. All this was utterly foreign to medievalism, which knew but of the imperium, or universal State, at the absolute service of the Church. It is quite true that the Reformation in its empirical beginnings had this inherited note. And it has not, in England as elsewhere, succeeded in surmounting it entirely by its intrinsic principle. There are many remnants of the theocratic idea still lingering in such venerable places as the coronation service. It took English Nonconformity to give to the Reformation its true self, and realise in practice what it really meant by religious liberty.

The Reformation did not propose as an end religious liberty in the political sense. It was not a battle for liberty but for truth. It did not, and does not, care for liberty except as a product of the truth and for its sake. Truth is the Church's aim, liberty only the means thereto. And the truth which concerned the Reformation was not the truth of the intelligence or the reason but of the soul, of salvation. It was saving truth and not scientific. It was the truth as it is in religion, and not in the schools. The Reformation asked (I have already said), What is truth—salvation by the Church, or directly by God? And it answered—salvation directly by God alone. This carried tremendous public consequences, which history was to unfold, and chiefly by Independency. But these consequences were not the conscious issue of the Reformation, which dealt with their Gospel cause or postulate, and not with themselves—as the way of the Church must always be. When Luther spoke of Christian freedom he had no idea of the rights of man or of classes. He and his friends did not in the least mean each man's liberty within the State to choose his own form of worship. He meant nothing so modern, so proleptic. That is liberty of conscience, and what preoccupied the Reformers was something higher and more fundamental—liberty of soul, religious liberty in the ultimate sense of the word. In the modern use religious liberty means the liberty of each citizen, as such, to be free even from God, to be an Atheist without loss of rights. But in the strict Christian sense religious liberty means freedom before God, in God, 'no condemnation,' freedom of intercourse with God, unhampered by guilt and the demands of a law which God has now made His own charge and become responsible for in Christ. It is the sonship of faith, the being at home, not in society, but in the Father's house and kingdom.

There was another conception of religious liberty, which we have seen arose alongside of the Reformation though not from the same root, and which came into violent collision with it—the liberty claimed by the peasant movement and the Anabaptists. For these, in part, liberty meant freedom from the tyranny of the feudal lord, and in part it was a soul freedom based on an appeal to the newly opened Bible; and it insisted on the reorganisation of society offhand according to the Sermon on the Mount. It demanded a radical reform of society apart from the deeper radicality of Luther's new creation by grace. It was urged by plain and pious men, who took the Bible as a code and charter of public right, and found it to counsel the subversion of all force and government. Freedom from the State was the ideal, not freedom in it. They were the Tolstoians (I have said) or pacific anarchists of their day, though pacific they could not remain. In a crude way they anticipated many of the ideas of religious liberty which only a later age realised. And they had a great and early influence upon the form of Independency (as has been shown), though they did not furnish its inspiration or its anchor. These came from a deeper source, by way of Geneva, and they were rooted and grounded on the Word rather than on the Spirit without the Word or above it.

It was the intimate liberty which is religion, and does not simply flow from it, that established Independency; it was a liberty conferred, not won; which in turn produced civil liberty. Spiritual release produced 'religious liberty.' And for us this must always be the case. We do not stand simply for civil liberty, but for civil liberty on a spiritual and evangelical base; not for a free State, but for a free State as the product of a free Church of men whom Christ has set free. That is the genius of our existence. We must always live on our cause, though we live for our product—on free grace for a free State. Our secret is in our inward and spiritual freedom, not in our outward and public. And the power in that secret, the power which as a historical fact produced civil liberty, was nothing else than the gospel of justifying and regenerating grace in Jesus Christ our Lord and God. It can never be anything else at last. Nothing else exists which gives the guilty conscience experimental and practical freedom with God, and so makes him his own freeman with men. And what has been here said about civil liberty applies to theological also. It is a secondary, though inevitable, product. It is not our reason for existence.

To take this last matter at another angle. In the extreme demand for theological liberty there is something that is not clear to me on the one hand and something that surprises me on the other.

It is not clear to me that the claimants are always sure about what they mean. In connection with religion liberty may mean freedom of knowledge or freedom of power; freedom to reach truth or freedom to declare it. It may mean freedom of research and thought or freedom of Gospel and speech; freedom to pursue truth not yet attained, or freedom (in soul or circumstance) to publish truth revealed once for all; freedom of theologising or freedom of prophesying. Which have the claimants chiefly in view? Freedom of research, in theology or elsewhere, belongs to the idea of a university, which must refuse to be bound by the past or by any finality. That is the freedom of the schools. And it is a very great matter, for which men have worthily fought, suffered, and died. But the freedom of prophesying, of publishing truth already ours, whether won or given—truth not now pursued but regarded as final in respect of progress and crucial in respect of destiny—that belongs to the idea of a church; whether it be the freedom wrought in the soul by such a Gospel compelling us to its utterance, or the freedom allowed by society securing us in its utterance. The university is organised in the interest of the one freedom, and the Church is, or should be, organised in the interests of the other. And their reciprocal service should not destroy their distinctive genius.

Now it is not clear to me which liberty is the leading concern with those who demand in our churches a freedom absolutely unchartered. As churches we have always supposed that we were created and organised in the interest of a final Gospel and its publication, a Gospel of historic revelation and not of future discovery; that is to say, in the interest of a religion given, decisive, personal, and practical. We are not organised in the interest of a theology, that is, in the scientific interest of developing truth, but in the interest of religion, that is, in the evangelical interest of realising it and spreading it, the interest of giving away what we already have by gift, and not of reaching by effort what we have not.

And this is where my surprise awakes. The demand for the extremest liberty in our churches is made in the interest of a progressive theology. That is to say, it is desired that they should be organised for theology as tentative, for theological research and experiment, that they should be so organised as to promote the culture of all sorts of views on such subjects, out of which ferment theological progress may emerge by the survival of the fittest. That is to say, really, the Church is to be organised as a university (and a bad one) and not as a church. There is the confusion. And the surprise is that the demand is made by people who are always telling us that in a church the great, ruling, and forming thing is religion and not theology, and that the theological interest is very secondary, and, when it gets the upper hand, mostly mischievous and obscurantist. Why then should a church be reorganised in any such interest, in the interest of a liberal theology, of a comprehension latitudinarian instead of positive? And if it be said that it is not claimed that the Church should be organised in that interest but in the interest of religion pure and simple, the only answer is that there is no such thing possible, and that their keen interest in the rationalising of it shows this. It shows the keenest interest in religious content, the renovation of religious content. Religion is meaningless or non-existent without an object, a revelation with storable features. And as the object or revelation is so will the religion be. And the statement of that object and of our relation to it is some kind of theology. And the only choice is between one theology and another, between the theology revealed as the principle of the final Gospel and some more subjective theology which is either incompatible with it as heresy, or destructive of it as paganism. And as the Church was made entirely by a positive final Christian gospel it cannot possibly be organised in the interest, or on the principle, of a religion which is but in the making, which is neither Christian, final, nor positive as yet, but is only free and inquisitive thought in an atmosphere of religiosity.

But the plea that Congregationalism exists to be an arena for unqualified theological liberty, and a cave of all the religious winds, is hardly worth discussing, as it does not seem to be put forward by any who are familiar with the genius of a gospel, the nature of a church, or the history of our churches. Unqualified religious liberty is but love in a mist, and it ends in the convictions of ghosts, the energy of eccentrics, the anarchy of egoists. It is going behind a long history and victory, which it ignores and wastes, in order to start a new spiritual struggle for existence from the very foundation, and to make a ring for a conflict of warring religious possibilities, out of which the Gospel may emerge or may not. Liberty can only exist as qualified. Everything turns therefore on what qualifies the liberty. And there again everything must depend on what creates the liberty. For in all spiritual freedom its only final authority is its source. Its normal principle is in its origin. And the source of Christian liberty is not any natural right—certainly it is not so in a religion of Redemption. Christianity is not a divine charter for natural independence—for the recalcitrant, the turbulent, the condottieri, who make no churches, but only troops that dissolve with them. It was born, as its servant, Independency, was born, in something that created a new liberty, and did that only by first creating a new and greater obedience. It put in our hands a new and greater trust than our freedom, something which made us free and able not only to serve but to serve it.

The question of our right and call to exist takes, therefore, a new form at the present hour, though its answer still means a return to the New Testament where our fathers founded us—only it is a return to the Word and not to the Book. What is asked of us is what is asked of every church which does not set up a monopoly of exclusive foundation and divine right. Are you, with your methods and organisations, well calculated to serve in a distinctive way the Gospel that God has given, and to secure its authority? Is Congregationalism, worked as it is for practical purposes by the majority principle, able to keep the trust, and put out to interest the capital, of a Gospel which creates and maintains a church as the supreme agent on earth of the kingdom of Heaven? Is such a Congregationalism able to guard and exercise this one trust given by God to men for the realisation of the New Humanity; especially when the Word is unpopular, and disappoints the people rather than wins them? Can its majorities be trusted to keep the faith, the word, and the power once for all committed to the faithful, and to keep it whether it succeed or not? Majorities may be naturally religious; they are not naturally Christian. Can a church which must, by its structure, be largely exercised in obtaining majorities for its necessary occasions and decisions, have the real presence and guidance of the Spirit which in history has mostly mocked majorities and worked by martyrdoms? To such question we answer, yes.

We are Congregationalist with good ground and hope that we do on the whole have that Holy Spirit and that living Word which make the real authority over authoritative majorities, and preserve them from the spiritual suicide to which they naturally tend. We take many risks. Faith always does. Liberty always does. They can easily be abused and travestied. But we believe that Congregationalism is worth keeping, and worth sacrifice; though only for its possession and service of that which makes a church a church and for its facilities in applying it to the public situation. We possess at the base of our being a living Christ, a positive Word, and a Holy Spirit, which alone have the right and power to control the majority principle, and to subdue it to be a principle of Church action in democratic times and conditions. We represent that principle as safe and good for spiritual purposes only when the community is composed of people whose souls are made by a positive gospel, and to whom it is more dear and effectual than any successes—even its own. That is to say, Congregationalism is workable and valuable when its ruling power is its chief treasure—not the majority, not mere truth, but the Word final in the Spirit; which Word, and not mere religion, we have to show flexible enough for modern conditions; but which Word also must be all the more positive with us because we in particular, with our loose organisation and our lack of a creedal standard, have nothing else to protect us from majorities whose vote and freedom might land us anywhere on a passing gale.

Congregationalism would never have come into existence if each church had not believed itself to possess in an infallible Book, opened by an infallible Spirit dwelling in the Church, sufficient authority to protect it from the gusty vote of the hour. The infallible book is gone, but none the less are we compelled, if we are to be permanent churches and not passing clubs, to replace it by some authority with equal power and right to rule decisions as they fall to be made. If we are without such an authority in our midst we are not churches, and we have no future; we have no right to boast of the old Independency as our past, and we have no right to look forward to a Christian future. If our decisions as churches are simply taken as the verdict of natural common-sense applied to religious issues, like the vote of any local authority, town council, or parliament; if we do not really believe in the present guiding Holy Spirit of a living Word and Gospel in our midst—then we are not churches; and we are bound to lose, to communions that remain real churches, those members who take the church idea in most earnest. The infallible book has gone, but the infallible and historic Gospel in it has not gone, nor, as we believe, its infallible and present Spirit. We have a Gospel historic, positive, decisive, and final, and we have the living action among us of the Spirit Who put it there. There lies our standard and control. We have an infallible Guide; and, if not always an infallible apprehension of His guidance, we have a growing apprehension of it, and always a faith in it; our faith has an infallible if our intellect has not; so that we may make mistakes but we are not wrong, and we are cast down but not forsaken, and we lose engagements but are on the side that has already won the campaign.

But if the whole book be plastic to criticism, and if our experience of the Spirit be explained away by the new psychology, if we but take stand on anything so subjective as the Christian consciousness of the day, then since that consciousness has no organ such as Rome, we are driven to mere consensus. But consensus is practically majority. And Satan cannot cast out Satan, nor the majority principle be its own authority. A real authority therefore is even more needful to our loose-hung liberty than it may seem to be for churches more organised. And if only we have it our course is safe and clear.

I have pointed out with some fulness the great part played in our origin by a spiritualistic Ana-baptism whose tendency was to override and ignore the creative, normative Word. I have spoken of the footing this movement had in the doctrine of predestination. And I have said that it became valuable to us only by being prevented from becoming master, and by being kept in its proper place. This we were able to do in virtue of three things :—

First, by the fact that the predestination was a predestination in Christ, i.e. in Christ crucified and risen, in the Word of His Gospel. Even with predestination the Spirit was not independent of the historic authority of the Word.

Second, by the rallying and controlling power of the Bible Word habitually used as the source of the Spirit, and not simply its correlate.

Third, by the English genius for local self-government and the larger politics, which gave us, in political liberalism and democracy, an ordered outlet for the individualism that dissolved the religious communities when it ran riot there. That genius has not left us, if only we show ourselves able to effect the transfer which must be made under the second head, if we can replace the Bible by the Gospel as the lynchpin of our liberty, and carry that Gospel clearly in our soul and openly on our forehead.

We have much heroism among us in the moral courage of men who are willing to face for their views a lifetime in great minority, unpopularity, and ineffectiveness—some of this heroism we have even running to waste. But what we have to rely on most is the greater spiritual courage to make the grand evangelical committal—to commit the soul and the world, amid all the seductions, bullyings, distractions, or criticisms, of the hour, to the final and ageless Word of the New Testament salvation. There is but one note of the true Church ; and it is not subjective but objective, not our mood to God but God's charge to us ; not a subjective spirit, like charity, but an objective relation, like faith. It is the note of the Gospel of the grace of God to guilty man in the Redeemer. We have the Church, not where we have the mere temper of Christ, but where we have the Word of His reconciliation, and that Word in actual experience, and authority, and effect by the Holy Spirit. It is a temper only because it is first a power, and a power through those in whom it is more than a sweetness. For did gentle Melanchthon not truly say, Summi adversarii nostri sunt suaves theologii ?

Our personal concern in the great historic act of God's salvation must be at least as intimate, passionate, and practical as our interest in commerce, criticism, home, civics, or politics—if we keep things in their New Testament perspective. It certainly is so in the New Testament. The Gospel is at least as personal and close an interest as home, country, or business, and for the most part much more so. And as long as we keep that book where we do, and yet invert in practice its standard of value, there must be inner friction and weakness. Many churches do observe that order of importance, many individuals. But it would be well to realise that no church is really a church or really free unless that be the perspective, unless that is recognised as the principle or ideal, however far we tarry behind it on a given stage in the evolution of our practice and the degree of our approach. And the real issue between the Free Churches and the rest is deep beneath the controversies that heat us; it comes to turn more and more on the place we assign in our practical interest and affection to the Church of the Gospel in the life of the Spirit. High Church says, 'I believe in the Church more than in the State.' Broad Church says, 'I believe in the State more than the Church.' But events have shown that Broad Church has no stability. It disappears upwards into High Church, or downwards into no church. And so it must be with the Free Churches that are more interested in the State than in the Church, and allow the mental habit of the Gospel to be quite subdued to the mentality of the State. A vivid interest in citizenship is no new thing among us. Two generations ago our great laymen everywhere made the mainstay of municipal and political life in their locality. All we feel to-day but develops this immense interest and influence exerted upon public affairs, and especially municipal affairs, by our fathers, and especially our grandfathers, in the formative years of democratic freedom and civic life. To surrender that interest would be to surrender their principles; we are not true to these principles unless we develop that interest. But the principles were in their case applications of a very positive faith and personal piety. And we should not be true to them if ever we became more interested and more intelligent in citizenship than in sanctity, if ever as a church (I do not speak of individuals) we are more concerned with sorrows than sins, with wrongs than guilt. We should then have to choose between a disappearance as churches into religious clubs and associations, and a firmer grasp of the High Church idea upon which alone a Free Church can rest. Congregationalism at least is High Church or nothing. It began with men who were ready to do anything with the State that the Church might be free and autonomous, men who held that the last word in history and affairs was with the true Church, and not with any amalgam of world and Church ; which usually meant that the world secularised the Church more than the Church spiritualised the world.

In proportion as the Church is divided up, i.e. as stress is laid on the local and congregational element in it rather than the universal, so much the more stress must be laid on the common faith, if the idea of a church, its unity, and its right to the comity of other churches, are to be cherished at all. The local association must be balanced by the common confession, tacit or explicit. We have never stood for absolute and unchartered liberty. Those who did sought it elsewhere. It was men agreed about the substance of the New Testament Gospel that made all the claims in our past for liberty, and guarded it so jealously. It was done in the interest of a great, free, and apostolic Gospel and its development ; it was not in the interest of a general and genial religion. They had no other source of their liberty than the Gospel, and no other worthy object of their sacrifice. The whole issue is raised again from the beginning, and from far beyond the beginning, when the right is claimed to deny and discard the apostolic Gospel. There is no right then to appeal to our traditional liberty, which has been entirely a freedom within the apostolic Gospel and not from it. And the great Church could not be expected to co-operate with a church where liberty went so far that everything was an open question if only we cultivated the spirit of tolerance and charity, or even a love of Christ. That is not Christianity but Tolstoism. It is not Christian charity but genial Judaism. The point is that in a church whatever is relaxed in the way of organisation must be more than made good by concentration on a real experienced and confessed Gospel of Word and Spirit, and not on Spirit alone. And accordingly Congregationalism can only hope to survive, and it is only worth preservation, enthusiasm, or sacrifice, according as its liberty is both fed and balanced by a very powerful gospel, whose theological progress and social service grow out of positive, personal, and immutable belief on the eternal things that matter for the soul and its salvation in Christ. No liberty is worth a church's while, no sacrifice even, which is bought at the price of all taste for worshipful reflection on God's eternal work for spiritual destiny, which makes a people grave, wise, and tender in its creation of the future from the past.

The great question before us, therefore, is not connected with our work or our machinery for the Christianising of society, but with God's. And it is the question whether we can prove in practice that an aggregate of small and separate churches is equal to a charge so great and integral as the first trust God has committed to the Church for the world—the trusteeship of His only means for Christianising society and effecting His kingdom—His historic, apostolic, final, universal, and eternal Gospel.

LECTURE IX

INDEPENDENCY AND ITS CREED

FOR a church what it believes is of more moment than what it does. Its belief is the thing that created it, and it is the constant factor which makes the continuity in its varying action. It inspires the action which is but fashioned by the hour. The Church is founded on faith, else it has no foundation at all; and on faith not as a subjective frame, but as our collective relation to a given object of holy Love, an object which gives itself in grace, and in that act creates the faith. Were faith chiefly a subjective frame there could of course be no statement of it. A mere spirit hath not flesh and bones. You cannot define an emotion; you certainly do not spread it in that way. But, faith being an objective and living relation, some living statement of it is not only possible but necessary if it is to be conveyed to others or confessed at all. We may say therefore, without the intellectualism which too often detaches belief from faith, that Christian faith always carries implicit in it a Christian belief, without which we can tell

it to nobody. And the Church's first duty is to confess in some form this common faith which gave it being. But if that be an act of worship (as all true confession really is) it can only mean the confession of the object and matter of faith. It does not mean an exposition of faith. And it cannot mean the profession of the Church's subjective attitude. The Church says but 'hear me'; it does not say 'look at me.' For then the Church would be preaching itself; and we preach not ourselves, nor our experience, nor our faith, but Christ crucified. We preach Christ crucified not in our martyr experience but in a historic and final Act, which creates the experience that takes it home, and does not simply hallow an experience it finds. The prime duty of the Church is not to impress, nor even to save, men, but to confess the Saviour, to confess in various forms the God, the Christ, the Cross that does save. The Church is there as the great confessor, in thought, word, and deed, of its Creator; and its action, varying with each occasion, is only a special form or corollary of its central confession that it owes itself, its worship, and its world to the glory of the grace that saves. The Church's activity in the world and for it is but one phase (which might be called the lateral phase) of the Church's perpetually ascending worship. Augustius a latiori differt. It works not simply because it believes but chiefly because of what it believes. Its belief is more than its work, for it creates it.

That is so in regard to the Church. For this or that individual it may be in a measure otherwise. His work may be more valuable than his belief; first, because his work is a part of the work of a believing Church which devised it; and, second, because there are many other individuals to represent and preserve that true proportion of faith and work which he may have lost. So that the individual may with far less peril than a church put action before belief. But if the Church make this error the mischief will not appear in the span of an individual life, but it tells fatally on the generations to come, and in a range proportioned to the truth concerned and to the greatness of a church's power for good or ill.

But we have run to an extreme individualism even in the Church. In dissolving the difference between priest and layman we have levelled down instead of levelling up. We have reduced the priests to lay 'lack-wings' more than we have lifted the laymen to a royal priesthood. The lay idea is uppermost in both our ministry and our laity; and the lay mind, especially in religion, is individualist, and is apt to hold even its social theories in an individualist way. Our ministers are laymen more than our laymen are ministers. And what we need is that the ministerial element should be uppermost in both our laity and our ministry. I mean this. Ministry is Christian service and self-sacrifice, and, if there be a contrast, laity is Christian self-assertion; and the Church's ideal would be that lay self-assertion should only be there in the ministerial name and spirit of self-sacrifice. The Christian can only assert himself as a social unit, one of a body, not of a crowd. But to that we have not yet come; and we are apt to treat personal faith as if it were but individual religion. The individual also, speaking generally, is still concerned more for his freedom than for his sacrifice. His first point of honour is, not that he shall sacrifice and obey, but that he shall be free to sacrifice or not as he will. And Congregationalism is more welcomed in many quarters because it offers a protestant and unchartered liberty than because it gives facility for obedience and service in the Holy Spirit. We have run to individualism in our ideas even of church life. Because for an individual a belief may matter less than conduct does, we jump to the conclusion that the same is the case with a church. And this individualist stamp we have transferred from the relation of church members to each other, and we have printed it on our churches as communities. We have let it settle their relation as churches to each other. Of churches also it has been thought and said, as if they were but magnified individuals, that what they do, or how they feel, is of more moment than what they believe. The 'spirit of Christ,' by a like subjectivism, is made of more account than the faith of Christ, or than the Holy Ghost.

We fall therefore into two classes—though they are of very unequal size and weight.

1. There are some who claim that Congregationalism permits no limit of belief either tacit or explicit, unwritten or written; that it is a mere creedless polity or 'apolity,' conceived in the interests of absolute freedom and sympathetic relation in the region of religion; that it is entrusted with no charge having an unbreakable entail from a historic revelation; that our freedom, therefore, is the one thing that we have to assert and guard, in order that truths with which we have not started may emerge as supreme from a perfectly free trade in opinions, and an unhampered struggle for existence between beliefs. By a generosity which has more geniality than justice, this amorphous liberty is defended by some mild idealists who do not need its benefit for themselves. It is held, in fact, that as Congregationalism is but a polity it is not essentially different from Unitarianism; nay, it has even been claimed that it contains nothing to exclude from our pulpits the denial that Jesus Christ ever had a historic existence.

2. The second and far predominant class consists of those who say that Congregationalism came into existence only on the basis of historic, apostolic, and evangelical belief; which to abolish is to alter fundamentally its constitution, and not only make it another church but destroy it as a church altogether. For Christianity is evangelical at its centre or else it is another religion. But (they say) within the pale and by the power of such an evangelical faith there is room and need for a great development of theology. For which development a large range of freedom is necessary. And the due freedom is best secured by a belief which though positive is unwritten. This view, I say, is the dominant one in Congregationalism. And it has served well on the whole, but only on the whole. It has left some belief very nebulous, and made nebulosity too tolerable. What remains to be seen is whether it will carry us through the totally new conditions of the future as it has so far carried us through the past. For now the whole situation is altered by the fact that the great issues are not so much those of formal theology, but of the historic facts and spiritual powers which make any theology possible. They are not theological variants but two religions, not a religious difference but a different religion.

As to a creed it has never been denied by Congregationalism that it has a creed; the only question is how it holds it. And we should distinguish several questions in this connection. We should first ask, Must a church have a belief? And to that we can only answer that so long as it remains a church it must. The Church did not create its belief, it was created by it and not by a vague religious impulse; therefore it cannot discard it and remain a church. We have then to ask whether that creed must be specified, formal, and written, be it long or short. To which the answer is that in most churches it is so, but not always. The question, where it is not so, is answered by Congregationalism. La tradition c'est moi. It has a creed but it is not a written one. Like the pope it embodies its tradition of belief. Its creedal cohesion has rested on an honourable, tacit, and evangelical understanding. And a written creed it is not likely to have, either until events show that the unwritten understanding is unable to secure the apostolic Gospel, or until the other churches, before entering on closer relations of union and co-operation, think fit to adopt a common expression of their basis, message, and purpose to offer the world.

Our future has a new feature which was not in the past, and it corresponds in a striking way to the political situation of the hour. It is this, that the constitution itself is being referred to the popular vote. What a constitution is to a State that a belief is to a Church. And, whereas up to now it has been a question of particular measures or doctrines to be accepted under a constitution, the question now, both in State and Church, is as to the locus standi of any constitution against the popular vote. Could a vote of the public abolish king and lords? Should mass meetings of workmen repudiate the leadership of their organised representatives? Could a vote of the Church abolish its constitutive belief? The questions are all au pair. They are but different phases of a great social movement, which might become a landslide. The Church is different from the State, however, in this respect, in that the one possesses in its creedal constitution a final gospel, deposit, or trust which the other does not; and it is therefore above the utilitarian considerations which for the other must be chief. There is nothing in history that the State could not amend or annul in the great interest of the nation; but that is not so with the Church. No consideration of utility could justify the abolition of its historic gospel. But so far the analogy holds, that the constitution, or the question whether there should be a constitution, has now come down from the lawyers or theologians to the lay arena, and is bandied in the streets of the city and the lanes of its press.

The pointed form which the question takes in the hot politics of the hour is, first, whether the public will in a vote is the will of the nation, and, second, whether that vote should be taken, on the old representative principle, by an election of responsables, or on the new mass principle of a plebiscite. The Conservative party has surprised many by moving for the latter. Which has been explained by some as the extension of an old policy to weaken the dignity, responsibility, and power of the Commons, and to carry forward the new principle which Lord Beaconsfield imposed on the party in a former crisis, of directly coupling up the monarch and the multitude.

But be that as it may in regard to the State, what concerns us and our form of the Church is this.

For us also the belief which is the constitutive element in every church is on its trial—and not even before a jury, far less a judge, but before our public. All that we have as a constitution is going to decision; and it is going where we have always had to take other and minor questions (however great)—to the popular vote. On this vote, however, up to now the constitution has always had a guiding and controlling effect. What will the popular vote do in the absence of a constitution, i.e. when it has to vote not by an accepted constitution of belief but upon it? For of course when we vote upon a constitution we do not really vote by it, we only vote whether we shall vote by it. And we vote by referendum.

For with our churches the mode of voting is settled. Our churches have not representative government. They are not Presbyterian. They have not a legislative eldership but an executive diaconate. They are pure democracies, and they act by referendum. In theory everything should come to the church meeting. The deacons' court is not really a court, it is a mere committee or executive; and nothing it does is valid till a church meeting empower or endorse it. It is convenient often, of course, to ignore this principle in practice, but principle it is. We work by plebiscite.

And so far it has done well enough on the whole. But so far there have been submitted to it only the ordinary measures in the course of legislation, so to say. What is presented for this mass decision now is the ultimate question of Christian faith and the Church's existence. The constitution is coming to be the question, in a far deeper sense than Congregationalism discussed a few years ago when it changed its organisation¹. All that was but regulative; the present matter is constitutive for the Church. And it comes to the membership as to the final court. The appeal is to a Christian adult suffrage. The constitution goes to the referendum, and is at the mercy of a sheer majority. This is a situation we have never yet had to face, and we are somewhat bewildered in facing it. Just as our English police system is not organised for dealing with armed anarchists, as it is too generously organised for a departure so new and destructive, so with our Congregational machinery. It has never had to contemplate and handle within its own community a challenge to the existence of the Christian faith. For the eighteenth-century Arianism was child's play to modern negation.

Now a plebiscite is all very well with a political question, where the principle of the matter is mainly utilitarian, and where the majority, if it give a sifted and considered verdict, has the power of the constitution in its hands by right. But it is a different question with the Gospel and the Church, where no possible majority, however long and severely sifted, has the right to undo or dispose of the final gift of God. He and His Gospel must be true in the Church they created, if every man be a liar. So that while on many grave theological points there could and should be accommodation, toleration, and a kind of co-operation, as of the two opposing parties in one legislative House, on this question in the Church there could be none, and heresy would be bound to end in schism between those who held to a final apostolic Gospel and those who renounced it.

But let us suppose this reference were made. Let us betake ourselves to the region of the political analogy, and suppose that the old Gospel, as constitutive of the Church, were submitted to referendum in all the churches.

It is agreed among constitutionalists that the referendum is, and should be, applied, not about a vague principle, but only about a definite measure, when it has been well discussed and formulated. But that clearly means, farther, that it shall be put into written shape. Both the Times, for the referendum, and Sir Frederick Pollock, against it, agreed upon that. If the constitution go to referendum it must be a written constitution. With the shunting of representative government disappears the glory, safety, and flexibility of our British politics—the unwritten constitution, honourably worked.

But what does that mean for us? Our common and creative belief, unwritten so far, has been our constitution, the axiomatic base on which a majority system worked, and the final governor of its action. It is what we chiefly have had to protect us from the gusty majorities to which democracies with their idolatry of the hour or the orator are so liable. For its sake the Church exists as a spiritual nation, and its occasions majorities serve but do not command. If it give way we are a Church no more, and there is no longer a living body with either a minority or a majority. That belief is the principle of our action. And the mode of our action is the referendum. But, as I say, it is of the nature of a referendum that it cannot be worked without a written and definite reference, just as in Parliament there must be a definite Bill. The only constitution that can be submitted to our plebiscite is a written one. What then becomes of the unwritten creed when, as the constitutive belief of the Church (were it but condensed in one article), it must be submitted to the mass verdict? Will an unwritten creed serve us when we come to vote on the Gospel? Are we clear and unanimous what the Gospel is? In the past even the unwritten base and bond has given shelter, facility, and plausibility to some movements for its denial. But if the creative creed became the great question of the future, could it remain unwritten when the issue arrived at the popular vote where all our questions come at last?

I raise the question. I do not table an answer. But if ever this became a practical question there is one thing that should be remembered. The crystallising is a question of expediency and not of principle. On the whole, and at present, we may be better without such a document. But there is nothing in Congregationalism which makes a confession of the kind fatal to it. That could only be if we totally changed the Congregational idea, and reduced it to mean a first concern for unlimited freedom of thought, instead of a first concern for the Gospel which makes freedom, in the only sense in which freedom concerns a church—freedom of soul. If we are dealing with the Gospel as something in which we are free, and not with it as something from which we should be free, there is no reason why, in given circumstances, we should refuse to say to neighbour churches or to an inquiring world what our collective Gospel is; and there might be very good reasons why we should say it for the Gospel's sake, whatever became of our Congregationalism.

This suggests other points of great moment. Declaration does not mean subscription. A declaratory expression by a community need not be a subscribed expression by individuals. The confession of a unitary church does not involve uniformity in every member, so long as it is not openly challenged, renounced, or defied. It is but characteristic and not coercive.

Again, a confession of faith is one thing, an exposition of faith is another. The confession need involve no more than one genetic article. It is not a theology but a statement of the Gospel. True it cannot be without developing a theology; for no Christianity can. But it is not itself scientific or explicated theology. It is a prime theology and not a secondary; it is more final revelation than tentative theology; more dogma than doctrine.

Yet, again, a great church on the dogmatic base of a prime theology must always tend to present a great world with a rich and ample theology. It must always move to declare its gospel not in a nucleus only but also in a plerophory, not in an essence but a totality, not by way of peeling down the onion to a portable core, but by way of rearing the germ to a spread tree. But in that case the confession, as it becomes expository, must change its form when circumstances have ripened to require it. All religion must have a theology more or less detailed. It must have a doctrine more or less explicit, unless it is a matter of atomic sentiment. And the doctrine or theology of individuals needs to become collective and ample belief, if it is cultivated in the consciousness of a community, if it express the mentality of that community, and become the badge and burthen of a church to a cultured world. The prejudice against this amplitude of belief is strong among us for reasons connected with our history rather than with our principle. And it is encouraged by two errors. One is that such theology must be final in its form, which is Roman and not Protestant at all. And the other is that it must be in the nature of a decree instead of a confession, a statute instead of a product, a standard instead of a register. We ought to be at a stage of religious culture far beyond such notions. When we really are, we shall be free to discuss the expediency at any given time of what our principle (so much richer than we know) gives us full liberty to do. The great thing is to recognise that it is equally open to us so to act or not so (else we are not free). If ever such a thing were done it would be entirely within our principle and competency. But also, and only, if it were recognised that any such public expression of the general or average belief, while it was standard for the time in the sense of being a living church's corporate confession, could never be so in the sense of being final and irrevocable in its statement, nor in the sense of being imposed on each individual; that is, it could be used in no exclusory sense, but only in a declaratory and characteristic. It could not therefore be an end in itself but only a means, dictated by special circumstances, toward the great end for which a church exists; which is the confession upon due call, whether tacit or explicit, of the New Testament Gospel as the spiritual interpretation of the world, the secret of its moral destiny, and the changeless authority that alone gives freedom its charter, its scope, its safety, and its service. It is simply a question whether, in given circumstances, the free Gospel would be better served by a church defining its belief in it or by not defining it. In either case the subsequent assent is left to the individual honour of those who share the Church's object and feeling in serving it.

As to the conditions which might force such a step. Already, on one side, on the practical side, Congregationalism without a working constitution more or less organised had broken down into a sand-heap, and the old, granular, atomic Indepengency is dead. It had failed at its lower end, in the poor and rural parts, where the extinction of the yeomen and the drift to the towns had made it in many places financially impossible. It had also failed in respect of the ministry; and the recent regulation of entrance to the office was to exclude the incompetent, or the otherwise dubious, who trade on the ignorance and inexperience of unguided churches. So that, by way of self-preservation, Congregationalism has had in these matters to adopt a written and express constitution which would have seemed to Independents of sixty years ago (who were very suspicious of the establishment of a Union altogether) a monstrous and treasonable thing. They believed, indeed, in conference, and not in absolute isolation. 'We are Independents,' says a document of 1645, 'no otherwise than to distinguish us from the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians; for no true church is independent.' But it was in conferences ad hoc that they believed, for discussion merely, and not in a standing organisation.

But if Congregationalism began to wither at the top instead of thus crumbling at the ground; if a wave passed over it, like the Arianism of the eighteenth century, which swept away into Socinianism some considerable scholars, pulpits, and trusts of the body; if such a thing happened, if a group of men arose with learning, piety, and moral weight, and without ambition or eccentricity, to promote aggressively the view for instance that the Gospel was simple and non-mediatorial Fatherhood, that Jesus was no more the living Christ now than Buddha, or that the Holy Ghost was but a phase of spiritual force—then it would be a difficult thing for other churches to co-operate with us. Church union or federation would be thrown back by so far. We might be left stranded in negation. And it might then be felt that a time had come to adopt something as clearly constitutive for our faith as the union scheme of a few years ago is for our works. But it would have to be something in the interests of the free Gospel and not of a correct orthodoxy, something more dynamic than detailed, and therefore more in the interests of a positive and permanent liberty than such a document as now stands in the Year Book, something more like the declaration of 1878 (whose absence from the Year Book is so inexplicable while the other is there). It can be no interest of ours to synchronise the clocks of thought, if only the Church and the world are sure that we have the common sun.

There can be no public or social religion without doctrine. We cannot preach without it. We cannot convey our personal faith to others without

it. And if that be so, it is necessary and latent in that personal faith; which dies if it is shut up in the close room of our own soul, because it gets no chance of exercising its mind. The time is well ripe for a reaction against the reaction against doctrine, and in some of the best quarters it is well begun. Theology was once a tyrant, but we have turned it into an exile, while we idolised eloquence or literature; and a restoration is overdue. It must come back; but it must return to a constitutional and not a despotic place. We have been much too free in giving it up to the negative and revolutionary critics. We have let ourselves go too far for a church's health when we entirely replace it by personal experience; as if we could ever personally experience that salvation of the whole world which we must both believe and preach. That is an essential element of our faith, but it can be so only as a certainty revealed theologically from One in Whom it is already a conclusive experience. We have gone so far as to say that if we cherish the Christian charity we may part with Christian doctrine indefinitely. We do not need (it is said) any doctrine of the cross if only we own the spell of Christ's inner life and sun our souls in His inner light. But how impossible it is psychologically. Our intelligence is not one of three watertight compartments which make up a floating soul, and enable it still to float if one of them is destroyed. The man cannot be separated from his understanding, any more than from his feelings, or his will. It is the man understanding, as it is the man feeling or willing. And will, or feeling either, is bound to deteriorate if cut off from knowledge. Faith without understanding is as hollow as faith without works. Religion without doctrine is as vain as religion without action. The curse comes home on the one route as surely as on the other. Without doctrine religion is obscurantist; and an undogmatic Christianity is often the refuge of amiable indolence and comfortable lack of knowledge. You cannot progress, you cannot adjust your faith to the mentality of any age, if you refuse to give it intelligible form, and state it as truth. Revelation is not statement, but it must be capable of statement.

And if we talk of experience, how are we to rouse the deepest experience in others but by the doctrine which interprets the unique and final victory of Christ? The ultimate Christian fact is that whole New Testament Word; it is not a certain putative historic person, distilled by criticism out of swollen records, who believed so and so, but might have been wrong, or wrongly reported. It is not the fact of Jesus but the meaning of Jesus. Everything turns, not on the fact of a historic Christ (which alone is mere prophetism), but upon a certain interpretation of that fact, which makes up the New Testament, which is possible only as doctrine, and as a doctrine which makes Him more of a living contemporary to-day than if we were alive in His part of the first century. It is impossible to gather and keep any church round Jesus as a mere residual historic character, acting on us impressionally and not intelligibly. That is to treat Him as a deep, mysterious, and imposing figure, but not as a sure, final, and creative revelation. It is His interpretation as a final revelation that makes the Church—His interpretation as the clear light of God and not the dim depth of man, the very presence of God and not the apotheosis of the soul. It is on faith in revelation that the Church rests, and not on reverence for a mystery—even were that mystery the inscrutable Jesus, or the imposing Christ. He is what He is for the Church's faith, and not for its reverence. It is a bad symptom when a church has more to say about reverence or charity than faith, and measures by the one instead of the other. It is mere æsthetic. And for our faith Christ is Revealer and Redeemer. His position and action are theological; and theology is valuable as the only adequate confession by an experient church of what He is.

It is in such a theology that the Church's charter lies. These apostolic truths are its constitutional foundation against any number of votes, or any keenness of wits. The Church's life is bound up with the Church's doctrine. And a non-doctrinal church cannot but be a weak church, always growing weaker, till it go under to the democracy, or be squeezed out by true churches with this staying power. Revised doctrine by all means; but a Christianity indifferent to doctrine is a Christianity without Christ, and left by the Spirit.

If we consider the whole situation of the Church in the world, and especially its belief, we find it in a crisis comparable only to that through which it went in its collision with Gnosticism in the second and third centuries—a far deeper crisis than the Reformation was. It is not only surrounded by pagan influences of a somewhat refined and sympathetic kind, but it is invaded by them; and many do not know where to take their stand—on the core of the Word or the best of the World. Many indeed do not distinguish them. How then, we ask, did Christianity come out of its peril at the time I name? It was by concentration and consolidation into the Catholic Church. The Church organised her life and her belief from a positive and distinctive centre of faith in a historic redemption. It was so then ; must it not be so now ?

But mutatis mutandis.

Then it was by a unitary organisation corresponding to the integrity of the Roman Empire. Now there is no such thing as one Empire, either to set the type or define the antagonism. We are faced by a multitude of independent nationalities and realms, which co-exist by concert and not by coercion. And if the Church concentrate to-day it can only be as the concert of many great independent churches. It can only be by the free federation of their variety.

Again, in the early centuries the Church crystallised round a definite confession of its belief. And federation to-day is no otherwise possible with any prospect of permanence, whether the belief is written (to work under the idea of right) or tacit (to work under the idea of honour). Without publicly owning some common and positive belief no church can continue to live or to act on the world, and no churches can cohere. Unsectarian, undenominational, undogmatic Christianity is not Christianity at all. Federation and confession therefore go hand in hand.

But in the early Church the union was effected under an exclusory creed imposed on individual faith, and always tending to define and to enlarge itself, not merely as theology but as a final creed. This was inevitable under the mentality of that age. But it is just as impossible under the conditions and liberties of the present. In so far as the Church has a statement necessary for cohesive life and action it must be what I have defined as a confession of the Gospel rather than what has now the procrustean associations of an expository creed. It must be declaratory and not exclusive, the expression of a corporate faith, and not presented for the subscription of individuals. Its purpose must not be to eject heretics, but to tell the world plainly what our corporate message of its destiny is, to prevent the public from thinking that our truth is but what every man thinks, and the Church a concourse of atoms ; to afford guidance to its own young, and especially to the neophytes of its ministry ; and to enable heretics to define their own position by it, and defend their due freedom within it. It must be central and not peripheral in its truth ; and it must also be general and not particular in that truth, just as it cannot be particular to individuals. But it must be general by intense compression and not by vague diffusion, with a simplicity strong and pregnant, not weak and poor, comprehensive of power rather than of people, aiming at influence rather than area. It must be a gospel rather than a theology, the broad message of a preaching church, and not the specification of an academic society. In contrast, therefore, with the tendency of the creeds, it must be brief and not diffuse, synthetic and not analytic, by preference consisting of one composite article, like 2 Cor. v. 19 f. It must of course be, as to its form, always in the power and control of the living Church, and revisable from time to time accordingly. But the more brief, central, and evangelical it is, and the less analytic, scientific, and detailed, so much less will be the need for revision, and the more infrequent the occasion.

But we should first clear our minds on the point whether the deeply longed and prayed for union of the churches is possible without some such understanding. Then we can work as we pray. When we are sure about that, one way or the other, we can then either drop the matter, or go on to settle what form the consensus should take. It may be pointed out that where union among the evangelical churches is going most rapidly forward, in Canada, in South Africa, or in Australia, the creedless churches have either to stand out, with the prospect of being rubbed out, or they have to come in after securing due modifications in the way of liberal statement, and the constant interpretation of it by the living Church.

The great matter is that for leverage on the world without, and for liberty to our people within, to our young ministers especially,¹ there should be no doubt what our message and gospel is; and that its confession may take any form, written or unwritten, best calculated in a church truly free to that end. There is a freedom from creed and a freedom by creed, and it is an old controversy which is the more free. But in a living church such a controversy could not exist.

What is the Gospel? What do we mean by the thing we call salvation? By the power of the Holy Ghost? What do we mean by the Gospel and its Word? How do we arrive at our true relation to Christ and to God? Is it by the consummation of man's natural excellence, or by redemption from his natural perdition? Is it by natural causes working historically, spiritually, and evolutionally, or by a supernatural, superhistoric power creating us anew? Many who deserve our respect, in this and other lands, seem to think there is nothing in a pure Christianity that the former hypothesis would not meet, and thus the latter would become needless theology. They not only honour Christ but they feel Him. Nor only so, but they strive to enter His soul, and some even to immerse themselves in Him. His spirit means for them His spiritual atmosphere, his inner habit, which they desire to breathe. He is distant, obscure, and needs effort; but they are willing, they are fascinated, to bestow it. It is so with the admirers of many a genius. Take the analogy of Browning. He too is obscure, but full, and even teeming. What is his message? what does he mean? Many have pored, and still pore, on his works. And for their help they join a society of others, gathered about the same centre, with the same desire to master the master. They privately ponder the documents; and that they may do it to richer purpose they form themselves into a fellowship of the like-minded. They own the spell of a mystery throbbing with revelation for such as are the wrestlers, and not the strollers, of the soul. And there is the piquant paradox of the contrast between his deep thinking in verse and his ordinary appearance and talk in society. So it is with Christ. There are many of the finer sort who cannot and would not evade His spell. And the more He eludes them the more He elicits and provokes. They devote themselves to the gospels, humbly, quietly, without any apostolate or any attack upon others. From these gospels they win a view and even an impression of Christ, which they extend and deepen by the aid of the fellowship, vitality, and tradition of the Church, or such sections of it as they find congenial; sections perhaps more inquiring than sure, more expectant than convinced, more gracious than powerful, more interesting than commanding, but still owning the social, spiritual, Christlike note. Under such influences they willingly call themselves disciples. And they even confess Christ as their ideal, their guide, perhaps their comfort. It seems so simple, fresh, and spiritual. And no few in these days are surprised that we should ask for more from any Christian. 'That is good enough for me.' We are familiar with this excellent side of the individualist type of reasonable piety. But individualist it is, however pious and attractive. These people wonder and regret that we do not stop where they do—over the mystery of Christ's imposing personality. Why did not Christ?

The great question is not what produces fine types of individual religion but it is something else. And something twofold. We have to pass beyond that to ask, first, Does that valuable result after all do full justice to the Christian revelation, the whole Christ as given in the New Testament, even in the gospels? And, next, is it a result that can carry a church, and so a world? Surely, no. We cannot read even the gospels without finding on Christ's lips quite as much about Judgment as about Fatherhood, about judgment as an element essential to a holy fatherhood; and does the admirable type of religion I have named do justice to that? Nor can we take Christian history as a whole, beginning with the New Testament, without seeing that this type could not carry the Church (however it may be carried by it), and yet that the Church is essential to the Gospel and Kingdom in the world.

What is lacking then in the type I have described? Often, in the first place, insight or patience for any plane of things above and beyond its own young naïve realism, innocent of all the problems with which Kant and his peers floated out the new age. And, next, the experience of apostle and believer, which in the New Testament seized on the Christ of the flesh, whom they had once known as the finest and greatest of prophets, and which identified Him with the ever-present Holy Spirit in a realism more poignant than the tragedy of life. They found in Christ not their consummation but their redemption, not their symbol but their Saviour, not their ideal but their Redeemer, not their guide but their life, not their comfort but their justification. They were not His brothers but His property. They found in Christ, not the reflection upon the sky of their inward best, but the invasion by God of their hopeless worst.

They found not cheer so much as mercy, not encouragement but forgiveness, not improvement and refinement but regeneration. They never think of finding themselves in Him but of finding God, never of finding self-realisation but always of finding divine revelation, not even of finding God so much as being found by Him. Christ did not in His person prolong their spiritual humanity into the heavenliest places, but He had to enter their souls and give them a quite new and revolutionised life. He had to create them anew by the gift of the Holy Ghost. An idea does not set up or restore life communion with God in the lost. He had to transcend in them all the historic influences that had made them, yea, even His own, felt merely as historic, and to become the Lord the Spirit, who acted on them, indeed, through history and its experience, but also in that very action, worked on them direct from God in a mediated immediacy. When they were bound into a community it was not that a church-spirit might assist them, but because the Holy Spirit had quite renewed them. Impressions from Christ were replaced by possession by Christ. And to live in Christ meant much more than living in his atmosphere as we might live in Tennyson's or Wesley's; it meant that He became their life and replaced their own.

It is this element, this new creative element, of personal redemption and regeneration that is the missing thing in the mystic-liberal type of religion which I began by describing. It has not as much power to convert and to create new life as some of the impossible orthodoxies. This is a lack that may be little felt by its subjects (though it is freely admitted by many of its impartial friends). The type may suffice for the quiet and normal experiences of an ordered, intelligent, and cultured life, whose interests are comparatively small and kindly, its sympathies more or less domestic or local, and its passions well in hand. Only when it faces the world problem in its passion, majesty, depth, and horror does it become so inadequate, like a maid in a mob, a yacht in a war, or a gull in a gale. And while it would be felt almost an abuse of terms to describe it as dangerous, yet dangerous it is, in the sense in which amiable people are dangerous in control of a stern situation and 'good fellows are bad officers.' Summi adversarii nostri sunt suaves theologi. There is a sense in which even fine spirituality and moral earnestness are dangerous to the Gospel; and certainly there have been true mystics and strong prophets who have renounced and assailed it. These half truths and genial virtues can be dangerous to the Gospel (which means to Christ)

when they announce themselves as the whole; when they declare in words, or prove within the limits of an individual life of inherited goodness, that they are independent of the Gospel, or even hampered by it; and when they lead people winningly to think of the Gospel as but one of many influences which produce the same excellent and standard effect. The case of George Eliot the positivist with her more than admiration for the Imitation of Christ, or the case of Martineau with his devotion to many like Richard Baxter, shows that altruism of a Christian temper, or piety of a Christian shade, may suffice for the personal uses of many who are really upborne upon the tradition of a society and a church resting on far more positive and abysmal foundations. But the mystic-liberal type does not suffice for a view, far less for a treatment, of a world so tragic, sinful, guilty, and desperate as history shows man's moral case to be. And especially does this discipleship-religion, this bloodless purity, this piety so kindly pious, and this faith so gently faithful, disqualify for any construction of this raging world which does justice to holiness and guilt, to the Cross and all its great train of effect, thought, and experience in the conscience resisting unto blood and saved as by fire. If there be no sense or faith of a decisive and new creative invasion of our personal life by God in Christ, but only a response by us to our affinity in Him; if there be no experience of a judging and saving revelation in Christ but rather of a spiritual evolution; then we are without a key to God's tragic and solemn relation to a world whose sin, perhaps, we are too pure to feel, whose misery we are too comfortable, and whose horrible guilt we are too placid to taste. If we have no real and critical revelation of God to our soul and conscience, then we have no ground in experience for recognising His great and crucial moral revelation in nature and history. The supernatural and the superhistoric on a world scale do not come home to us without the key of a crucial salvation from death to life, a real regeneration, and a new creation in the Holy Spirit. Such at least is the case with the Church as a whole. One does not of course expect the great dogmatic content of the Church to be reproduced in the experience of every member of it. That is a fertile source of forced piety and hectic faith. But, however it may be with individual cases, a church whose corporate and classic experience does not know the new creation in the Spirit, and a real conversion from the evolutionary progress even of a religion, can be no real witness of the supernatural in nature or the superhistoric in time. It is therefore a church incapable of serving Christ's purpose of a gospel for the world, or of promoting His kingdom, however it may revere His memory, own His greatness, or even adorn His teaching.

Therefore, I repeat, the test to which Congregationalism is being exposed does not concern its power to show a fine spirituality, or a keen philanthropy, or a zeal for social reform. But it is the question whether it is a capable trustee for God and man of anything so searching, critical, and revolutionary, so creative, universal, and eternal as the Gospel committed to the Church in the New Testament is. It is whether we can remain a Church of the Spirit that wields the Word for the world, or are doomed to subside into a large and promiscuous society of beneficent but insular spirituality—which spirituality in the next cycle ebbs to religious good form, while its beneficence sinks to genial good-will, and the cross becomes a Christmas tree.

LECTURE X

THE NEW CALVINISM—I

I HAVE been speaking of the religious, theological, and ecclesiastical features of Independency; but something remains to be said about the continuity of that public action which we have also seen to be such a distinctive note of its history. I have hinted that perhaps its lack of organisation handicaps it in dealing with social problems; while its tradition suggests rather political interests, and social questions chiefly as these increasingly become political. It becomes more and more difficult to say what the precise form of the Church's contribution to social questions should be. Its gospel certainly has social consequences, and a social ethic. It is the Church's business to teach accordingly. But how far is it its business to force any social programme for legislative effect? How far should it pass beyond loving sympathy, moral demands, and slow education in such things? How far can it lay down planks in a social platform? How far should it bring direct pressure to bear on legislation? Does or can the Church as such know enough to urge a minimum wage by bounty-fed industry? Social problems are now mostly economic. They are very complex, and call for special knowledge and experience. They are being taken up more and more by Christian men, specially selected and organised for the purpose. They belong to a whole class of questions which once were controlled by the Church but now more properly pass to the State, or to society combined for the purpose in voluntary action. Is it asked that in a great economic question, like the current strikes, where two huge interests pull apart and go to war, the Church shall place itself on one side of the tug against the other? Would that not be like giving one of them the benefit of a black military? Certainly there is a kind of economic issue where the Church has a right to intervene with a strong and urgent opinion. The working classes, we are told, are interested at present in little but wages—not in politics—in a larger share of what they go to make. Who can wonder? But the wage question is twofold. It may concern a living wage to all, even the least skilled, the demand that a man should enjoy the fruit of his labour to an extent that enables him to live under cheerful family conditions without hardship, poverty, and strain. Or, when that minimum has been reached, it may concern a share, which is just on other grounds, of the profit which skilled labour enables capital to make. In the latter case the Church has little call to interfere. It is a matter of the market, and of collective bargaining which need not be less friendly than other business. But in the former case the Church has both a right and a duty to speak. In the interest of the moral personality it must urge that the practical people shall so re-arrange things that profitable industry shall not rest on a foundation which in some ways is worse than slavery—worse because the slaves were well fed as pieces of property, and tended as machines. But I do not know any church, certainly any free church, that does not hold that doctrine, and does not express it by its representative men and assemblies as soon as the facts become certain and clear. But the Church is asked to cast itself collectively into a fray, and take a side when the crisis has become acute. Well, even that is not more than might properly be expected if the oppressed side was helpless, and had no more effective champion or weapon. But the power and right of labour to combine under moral conditions provides it with a weapon more effectual than a charitable championship from without. It can develop from its own interior men who are better able to manage its case for reform than the ministers at least can do who specially represent the Church and its regeneration. And the entry of the Church on the actual arena has often been met with contempt or ridicule more or less polite from one side or the other. On the other hand, the more the Church refuses to go down into the party clash, so much the more explicit she should be in her moral guidance to those who do. And so much the more should she rouse the conscience of those who, having done well out of the existing order of things, are much too content with it, and ignobly hostile to its change.

The public question of the hour is the question of poverty. It is a question which it will take the combined resources of all sections of society to solve. And it is a question in which the Church has a hereditary right. The Church spread faster, though not deeper, at the very first by its willing ministrations to poverty with such wisdom as the age allowed. Its unparaded ministries to the poor have run alongside its more ostentatious energies all the way like a mountain stream by a bustling road. The monasteries sheltered beneficence as well as pomp and idleness, and they came to their power and pomp by it. When the modern economic age began, capitalism was taken charge of by the Calvinism in which Independency grew; and it became the great means by which opportunity was found for the worker and help for the poor. It has made the conditions in which labour is rising to power, and maintaining its own cause, as capital did against its feudal foes. True, the richest grow very rich and the poorest very poor, though the workers in the mass are better off than ever; yet the standard of living has recently been rising faster than their means, and, quite recently, prices rising on a fixed wage. And, besides the standard of comfort, there has been rising the standard of justice and of the labourer's right to a larger share in the fruit of his toil. The extremes are acute, and it is the present business of society to adjust that tension, and of the Church to press the adjustment as a duty. And the Church as a whole (I am not speaking of individuals or groups) does not make a secret where its sympathies lie when the facts are clear. But it would be a poor service to poverty, if the Church were to win a victory for it, and make it a present of the victory, when it can enable and encourage it to win it for itself.

One finds political speakers often calling on the Church, as it values its life, to come to the social rescue; but I do not recall one who gives it an informed programme, or who sees that the real unity of the Church for social or any reform cannot rest upon its combination against abuses or wrongs. Though of course more in the Church should be active, as more of the working classes should be living up to the labour ideal. Many seem to think that if the Church is not on the ground for social reform it has no reason to exist at all. To all such it should plainly be said that, while the Church must do much for social reform, that is not the chief end of the Church. Its work for its chief end it must settle for itself. The outsider has no right to prescribe. A particular programme, presented for its acceptance at the peril of unpopularity, may not be the line of action its own judgment may prescribe; the adoption of it is not necessarily the article of a standing or falling church. The supernatural mission of the Church is always prime. If the representative of the Church cannot speak for the working class as their own experts and orators can do, neither can these speak and judge for the Church, especially from outside of it and its first charge in its Gospel. The Church can only speak to any purpose when it is regarded by either side as a real adviser and not as a useful asset. And on the whole that is not how any church is regarded when war is declared.

But the service of the Church to the social problem is much deeper, and more vital; it is less obvious, less direct than the order for the day, and therefore less welcome. It must provide a satisfaction for the supreme and aching need of society in all ranks, for the moral need everywhere, the need of a habitual authority, final at once for the individual and for society, which it is man's glory to own and his prosperity to serve. The lack of this is dissolving society. The age of the conflict for liberty is practically drawing to a close. Liberty has in the main been secured. Its cause at least is safe. The problem is not to win it, but, having got it, to use it. What are we to do with it? How is it to be kept from disintegrating society, how made the large atmosphere of its consolidation and progress? Capital and Labour are equally free to combine, so far as public liberty is concerned. It is an immense power, charged with as much possibility for destruction as for construction. Have we imagination enough to forecast the consequences of impatient action on a large scale, or docility enough to listen to those who do? Is the power held with any due sense of its responsibility? What is to furnish a conscience for it? What or whom is it chiefly to serve? To what solemn authority does it go which can guide a power so great and terrible? For the press this means nothing. But in action and in belief the supreme need of the hour is an authority, a living conscience universal, nay eternal, a real

King of Humanity, with a first claim to be worshipped and obeyed, and not simply to be utilised in the junctures of life, whose holy will and loving purpose every human ideal must serve and glorify. Our supreme need is a holy and actual God, of the most intimate and eternal relevancy to Humanity, with power to love to the uttermost, but also to secure to the end His purpose of love, to secure it step by step in history, to raise the weak, war down the proud, judge to the last farthing, save to the last soul, and reign and rule for ever and ever. A God we need, Whose whole reason for existence is not simply to serve, indulge, and aggrandise Humanity till it behave like a spoilt child, but Who exists to make His free service, honour, and worship man's chief end, his first care, and his final crown. That is the supreme need of the hour—to provide and secure in practical effect amid human affairs that Lord as not only our Saviour but also our daily Master and Majesty. And that is the need the Church alone meets. To bring and establish in men's hearts and business such a God is the Church's commission from Himself, and the last and greatest service it can render to mankind. The Church alone has a Gospel of which it can say that if every man received it and obeyed it social questions would solve themselves. If that Gospel is rejected then of course the Church must be scorned.

And what has it else at last? Humanity can look after its own progress, but it cannot provide its own God nor save its own soul. And when the last pinch comes it is by God we live and progress, and by such a God, and not by bread alone. The first society the Gospel has to consider is the Church it created, in which all society is to be blessed.

Let me return to this by a large curve, but all in the context of the chief interest of these pages.

It is said with truth that Independency has thrown entirely away the Calvinism in which it arose. Last century it passed, through an eclectic kind of Arminianism, to a religion of Fatherhood in which Christ holds a vital place, though one variously construed as more or less close. But there would be an almost unanimous repudiation of Puritan Calvinism; and the works of its divines are as unsaleable as a diamond-field at the North Pole, or a gold mine under the Atlantic. It is not perhaps quite clear to most what it is that is rejected. For some Calvinism means no more than it does to the littérateur—it is a portmanteau word for all in Christianity that makes a demand for positive belief, or is outside the interests of current sentiment. But most people, if pressed, would probably say that the intolerable thing in Calvinism was the doctrine of predestination.

Even there there is often some lack of lucidity. The objector does not object to believe that God has chosen him to eternal life and goodness, or that his moral hope is in the individualised love of God. Aimer c'est choisir, always. And if he observes what is going on abroad he may see that some of the most pronounced liberals are returning to a fresh interest in the doctrine, as one that cannot be entirely got rid of in any reasoned view of God's relation to man—even if you regard nothing more than the inequalities of society. But what would probably be most unfamiliar to him is this, that the essence of Calvinism is not the doctrine of predestination but the doctrine of God—which is indeed the essence and characteristic of every religion, and of every great version of it. (The triune God, for instance, is what makes Christianity Christian.) Predestination was in this respect a means rather than an end. It was the only means that Calvin, or Augustine either, saw for giving effect to the supreme end, which is the absolute freedom and majesty of God in the course of history. Let what may become of man's freedom, they said, nothing must impair the absolute freedom of God's grace. Our first concern to-day is really a secondary one—how man can be free with such a sovereign God; but Calvin's was the primary concern—how God can be free with such men.

Calvinism did so much for man's freedom because it would first have God's at any price to man, and would secure the glory of God even if most men were a shame. To provide for this supreme interest Calvin, like so many of the world's first minds, saw no other means than a certain doctrine of predestination. But the immortal service of Calvin to faith has not been his means, but the persistent supremacy of his end. It is the reduction of man to serve the freedom and worship the glory of a holy, loving, and absolute God.

And to this must we not return? From this have we not strayed towards chaos? We Independents in particular, who can never resume our great founder's form of predestination—can we not, should we not, recover his idea of God as absolute Lord? With our extreme sensibility to the movements of each age, have we not become the victims of the humanism, the subjectivism, the atomism, of the last several generations? Is that not the secret of our waning hold upon humanity? Human nature in the end yields more in the long run to those who command it than to those who indulge it, to a prophet of God with his word 'Repent' than to a tribune of man with his word 'Expand.' Have we not joined those who regard God as man's first asset rather than man as God's first subject and servant? Have we not taught men to think of Him as their lover and benefactor forgetting their King, as the fount of an infinite pity rather than the Father of an infinite holy majesty? Does that not mean that we have had more to say about God being wholly at man's service than about man being absolutely at God's? Is that not the reason why we find it so difficult to get service for God? Is it not because we are always accustoming man to think first of himself, with God to wait on him and his ideals?

Must the Church not return, with or without us, to Calvin's idea of God, which indeed is the idea of the Bible and of Revelation? Did Christ not save man by first glorifying God? Is a new Calvinism not part of the true Catholicity? Must we not do, if not less to win the democracy for the Church, more to glorify the God who saves it? In the failure of our effort to win the democracy must not all the churches go back to a more close and prime concern for the God who alone can win it, and for the revelation that alone can save it—back to at least as much concern for God's truth as for human welfare, which can only stand on that truth, and prosper as we magnify it? Does not the threatening and anarchic state of society—when we are unsure whether the great providential calamity which is to bring us to our senses will be war with a foreign power or a civil war more bitter and no less deadly than the stricken field—does not the state of society indicate that the gospels of the last century have failed—orthodox or heterodox—and that the hour needs another, if it be not yet too late? Is it not the hour when we should have, not indeed less to say about a ministering God, but more about a ruling God, not less about a healing God, but more about an authoritative God, not less about a Gospel that blesses, but more about a Gospel that commands, judges, humbles, and awes? If we did preach in word and deed a God like that, should we not be more true to ourselves and our source, to our genius and our genesis, than if we pursued the empty phantom of an absolute liberty without an absolute Lord, and a free Spirit without a final Word?

The Christianity of a great mass of cultivated Christian people might perhaps be described as Christian Personalism, the culture of personality by means of Christianity, and the culture of the kind of Christianity that best lends itself to that purpose. It is a conspicuous feature of that lay religion which deserves so much more study from those who aim at understanding the Christian public than it receives. One excellent quality this ethical type of religion has. It is in protest against the external culture, the mere civilisation, which has taken such violent possession of the age—the passion merely to master and enjoy the world, with all the facilities thereto that applied science or social opportunity lends. Something is still to be said, it is felt, for applied religion. Culture by all means, but not the culture of science nor of art, but moral culture; and moral culture with all the aids lent it by religion, and notably by the most ethical of all religions, by Christianity. Material culture must be corrected, enlarged, and saved by moral culture of an idealist kind. Many of the most influential writers, philosophers, and theologians of the day are of this stamp. They turn from naturalism, and the grosser realism, and the elaborate machinery for comfort and enjoyment. The only real thing for them is personality, the only real religion the cult of personality. Christianity is the religion of ethical culture. They psychologise on the subject, they spiritualise. They are not Monistic. They have a firm yet large grasp of the personality of God; and they cling to it as the chief guarantee of man's personality and its culture. Their object of life is the creation and development of personality, under such an influence as religion in chief. Their goal is the perfecting of that moral organism; and that perfection is an instinct which it shares with every other living thing. Everything in life (including often God Himself) is held to be there for this service. It is all material for this high—shall we call it?—egocentricity.

The highest types of this tendency come very near us, and seem to many to be quite within the kingdom of Heaven. They recognise, as some one points out, two supreme obstacles to this personal perfection on which all life should be set—the laming power of sin in the will, and the dooming power of guilt in the conscience. This bondage, this guilt must be destroyed. The conscience must be forgiven, the will must be renewed. The personality is choked and hampered at every turn till this is done.

What is the real ruling interest in this high and attractive scheme? What most fills the mind of those who cherish it? Is it God or man? Is it the holiness of God and its due, or the moral career of man and its due? Is it God's sanctity or man's moral dignity? Does man supremely serve the right and majesty of God, or does God serve the absorbing moral ideality of man?

They turn to Christ. Indeed they seldom turn away from Him. He comes to fill their ideal world. Here is the supreme case of the moral personality perfectly realised and overcoming the world. Could we but be perfect as He is perfect. Here is the mighty man of soul, the grand symbol of spiritual manhood, the apotheosis of all the faith which crowns character, and which we but feebly win. But Christ is for them the divine subject of faith not its object, the great exponent of our faith not its recipient. He is the chief hero, or the symbol, of human kindness, ethical sanctity, and ideal religion. In Him we do not meet God, but only the greatest of all who have met God. He represents not God manifest in the flesh so much as God appreciated in the Spirit. Beyond that Soul's attitude to God faith cannot go. But as to God's attitude to the soul, even Christ is not absolutely final—since in Him we have man's supreme grasp of God rather than God's supreme grasp of man. God, revelation, is still in the rear; what is to the fore is man, faith, sanctification, self-realisation. God reveals Himself for man's moral aid and perfecting, for character not for the kingdom, for such a creation as Christ was, not for anything which God owes primarily to His own holy and awful name. Redemption is all, atonement is nothing. Thus Jesus, as the perfection of faith, even comes between them and a ruling God. God is apt to be regarded as but the divine means for that ideal human end. Religion takes the place of God in the subtlest way, and we are tempted with the most angelic light. "We have a theology, brilliant as never before in all that concerns insight into the humane and genial aspect of religion, and rich in its power to divine the divine in the many creeds of earth; but one that is really an anthropology rather than a theology, being more engrossed with the divine side of man than immersed in the deep things of God." Just as the worldling loses God in His gifts so this view of things loses God in His graces, in His fruit in man. We are skilful in the philology of the book of History, but we are to seek in its exegesis, and nowhere in its theology. God is apt to be sunk in history, and in the triumphs and spiritualities of the soul, just as, for many on a lower stage, He is lost in nature. Not that His power is not felt in nature, any more than His effect is unfelt in the classic creeds of the prophetic souls. But practically these religions are in front and He is behind. They engross us as He does not. He has the courtesy rank, they have the real. Just as in our provincial towns there are philosophical societies in which never a word of philosophy is heard, the rudimentary terms of it are not understood, and all has dropped to physical science of a more or less amateur kind; so we have works, journals, and chairs in theology which are absorbed, and often successfully and even brilliantly absorbed, in history, but strangely shy and unfamiliar in the region of such theology as unravels God's revelation of His ultimate nature, purpose, and thought. They cultivate or even parade a dogmatic indifference, a theological agnosticism. We are not irreligious, but we are not Christian. The whole type of our religion is anthropocentric instead of theocentric; it is more concerned with the growing personality of man than with the holy personality of God. Therefore God's love itself becomes a powerless thing, moving eloquence more than action, touching us when it should humble us, and wooing where it should make us wince. And the person of Christ becomes then but ill understood. For it has been well said that God's love becomes for us a reality only in the Godhead of Jesus Christ, which, the lay Christian is apt to think and ready to say, is not a thing he can or need understand. Whereas it is the one thing he must understand, and it must be made capable of being understood by him, if a Christian he is to remain, or his children. I will not say it is meaningless in such a case to speak of God's love, but it lacks the chief thing which needed to be secured, and which Christ came to establish about that love—its reality, its certainty, its holiness, its majesty, and its secure triumph in the race. Such partial triumph as it has is only in souls, or a group of souls. It is not asserted over the whole of creation, the whole of nature. God subdues the soul, but He does not command the world. Like the reflex action of prayer, it is a victory subjective to faith, it is faith's reaction on the soul; it is not objective, not mastering, for creation and all the powers therein that war upon the soul. It is tempted to dismiss Christ's miracles on nature by comparison with His personal effect on souls. But without the miracles and resurrection of Christ the theodicy is incomplete—certainly the eschatology is. The groaning of creation is not stilled. It was not the whole of Christ's work to create a kingdom of souls whose moral elevation should transcend all the ills that flesh is heir to, and lose in elation the sense of them. The miracles that controlled Nature have a larger revelation than that—imposing as that is. They are harbingers of the restoration of all things, and preludes of the time when all things are palpably to work together for those that are called in God's purpose of love. The human fruition of God's love is not all. There is, besides, its almighty power on creation, which groans and travails with the holy consummation. There is God's purpose with the creation as a whole—which is there to glorify God and justify Him for ever. That is man's chief end—to enjoy Him, indeed; but in the conceit of a creation uttering His self-justification after all for having made it. The supreme object of life is neither to perfect the soul nor to enjoy God, but so to finish the work given us to do as to justify and glorify Him for ever. And our quest must be by what life or death we should glorify God.

There is a widespread sense, even among those who all their life have magnified the love of God, and have done so at the expense, often, of everything else divine, that there is something wrong in the message. Or less wrong, perhaps, than inadequate and short. It does not reach. It is ineffectual. It lacks something. It is short of the fulness, the urgency, the compulsion, the incision of the Gospel. It lacks practical effect on character, even when character is the standard. A gospel of nothing but love does not produce character. Is it not just because something so subjective as character is the standard, because we have our eye on our moral selves and our needs more than on the holy God and His dues, because of something that is not given us even in the character of Christ, something not revealed except in the cross of Christ? It is felt that there is in the conception of God's love, and especially in the more modern gospels of it, something one-sided, something over-obvious and therefore weak. God's love is too much a matter of course, too facile in Him, to arrest people. It does not make them wonder and fear. It is just paternity transfigured, maternity taken up to heaven. There is a soft and cheap strain in it which unfits it for the moral task of seizing and rearing personality in a mighty history like man's. An element has gone out of it whose absence makes half the Bible meaningless—the element of holiness, majesty, and judgment. Love is thus preached as a means instead of an end, as a moral means instead of an absolute worship, as a means for personal culture, self-realisation, and finishing the soul's pyramid. It is love finely egoistic, but egoistic still; and therefore, in so far, morally impotent, and unequal to the final consummation of a race of souls made for God's purpose before their own perfection. The matter of guilt is not dealt with. It is put aside. We are invited to forget it, and not brood too much on it; to forget it in a hopeful courage within ourselves, and in the culture of love from soul to soul; for which good cheer we have Christ as sufficient ground. But is the love of God revealed to us in the New Testament chiefly as the great means for our personal culture or cheer, moral and spiritual? Are we not here for that God more even than that God for us? Can we wonder that religion becomes trivial when the matter of revelation is so belittled, and God is made to serve thus? Can we wonder that it loses solemn fear and deep humility, and the note of obedience? It loses the effect of God's self-surrender in Christ because it loses the sense of the greatness He surrendered. Christ has not the dynamic of the triune God. Guilt comes to be felt as a disorder in us instead of a wound to the holy majesty of God. And the cross of Christ is treated as the great means of our peace, or of harmonising our life by the spirit of sacrifice; whereas, because God is God upon all the floods, it is the judgment which re-establishes His holy righteousness on the riot of our sin by an act as awful, real, and historic as the sin itself.

Many fine, ideal, and earnest spirits take God's love much too lightly; and we feel a certain shock of contrast between their own earnestness and the comparative levity of the message they bring. There is a conjunction of the serious personalism I spoke of and a certain—well perhaps levity is a term too heavy—a poverty, and futility. It leaves many a Christian with what might be called but a young and mettled faith, given to military methods and metaphors, an unbroken, untamed, unsearched faith, a forthright, cheery, self-certain and self-respecting faith, which savours more of old Stoicism or a young colony than of the broken, shamed, and contrite spirit which finds itself not in personal development or culture but only in an absolute salvation. As if Christ came but to promote moral excellence, service, and happiness, and the offence and tragedy of the Cross had now ceased.

The cult of culture has invaded Christianity too far when it reduces the cross of the Eternal Son of God to no more than a means of spiritual discipline and the production of character. Personalism of that kind is certainly a part of our sanctification.

But it was not solely, not directly, for such ethical sanctification that Christ lived and died. Our sanctification itself grows from our redemption. It is the evolution of our justification. And we must orient our experience anew, from the centre provided in the Cross as the self-justification of God, and the atonement He made to His own Holy Name at the moral heart of all being. A living relation to Christ's Person there must be ; but also it must be, or tend to be, a deeper relation still to His Cross as the core, crisis, and achievement of His person. Otherwise there is danger of Christianity, in some of its most worthy and attractive forms, becoming a religion of moral culture and spiritual æsthetic. Christianity is not cultured spirituality, but a new creation. Discipleship is well, but it was not discipleship that conquered the world for Christ, it was apostleship. It was not a disciple church but an apostolic, a church not of Christian learners but of Christian confessors. Since the decisive things of the Cross, the Tomb, and Pentecost, the Christian is much more than a disciple of Christ—he is a member of Christ ; he is a confessor and a regenerate. Discipleship is no match for the degeneration and egotism which are in the world by lust. We are not now Christ's disciples merely but His purchased property ; and Christianity before it is a discipline is a salvation. It is not the religion of spiritual personality, but of moral redemption by atoning forgiveness and sanctification by the Holy Ghost. Christ is more than Master or Brother ; He is made to us justification, and sanctification, and redemption. And above all He is our Lord God with something more than a value for us—with an eternal and costly right whose value we but poorly prove.

One thing let me make clear, to avert a despotic idea of God's Lordship. It is not the Lordship of a mere imperative, even of the moral imperative idealised, but of a triumphant teleology, the vast Amen. The great moral motive after all is less a command than an ideal, and it is most of all a practical consummation. An ideal kindles us more mightily and effectively than a decree ; and an ideal which is a purpose, and not a purpose only but a universal purpose already achieved and victorious, does so most of all. Such is the moral majesty of God—God not as the Eternal Imperative of the conscience but as its Everlasting Redeemer. His absolute royalty is founded in His absolute and finished salvation of the whole world. And the centre of majesty has passed, since Calvin, from the decrees of God to His Act, to the foregone establishment in Christ's Cross of a moral Kingdom without end, which is the key and goal of history.

LECTURE XI

THE NEW CALVINISM—II

THERE is a practical illustration of the way in which a humanitarian or anthropocentric conception of God defeats its own end, and threatens practical atheism. I refer to the attitude of the working classes to the churches.

The reference is to the working class because it is the class which at the moment is fighting for its footing in the economic conflict. But had the same conception of God been the prevalent one when the middle class was engaged in the like battle, what I say would have applied equally to it. It is, however, a peculiarity of the present situation that the rise of the democracy coincides with the modern anthropocentric idea of God as tributary to man ; whereas the upper and middle classes secured their position under a different conception—one which regarded man as there for obedience to God rather than God for the service of man. The rise of the middle class, especially, took place under the influence of Calvinism, in which there is no question as to the theocentric place of man rather than the anthropocentric place of God. God is certainly there for man, but only with the purpose of putting man there for God. The present struggle of the democracy is the first great class struggle that has taken place under the humanitarian idea of God.

What then is the action of the idea upon the working classes to whom it comes ? What they are told is that the chief value of God to man is as a helper ; and if He is offered as a saviour it means mostly a saviour either from the consequences of sin, or from the poor, or even wretched, conditions under which they live, and especially from poverty. And of course that is so. Christ's God is such a God. But is He that first and last ? Was that Christ's raison d'être here ? Is that all He is ? Is He there to make the most of man at any price ? An overfond mother may sacrifice everything to make prosperity and position for her son, only to be heart-broken when she finds she bores him, when he refuses to see her because he is too busy, or has a party of his great friends, or when he finally disowns her because he needs her no more. Is that the fond nature and fatal outcome of God's Fatherhood ? Does it only give, foster, and fortify ? Of course when I draw it out so, and so illustrate it, those who offer such a God repudiate the idea. But that is simply because they pursue it no farther than its sentimental aspect, or its benevolent utility. They are sometimes without moral insight or imagination. But the practical effect of such a God is, in the long run, no other than my parable indicates. The race becomes pauperised, exacting, and intractable. This must always be the practical effect of a God who is God to us only because of His value, and not because of His right, only because He helps us and not because He rules us, only because He asks sympathy and not obedience. The Church is suffering much because it has preached a salvation from sin's consequences instead of from sin, from what a man suffers than from what he is and does. Is it not another phase of the same fallacy when we offer a God whose chief use to man is to supply him with a living rather than a loyalty, and abolish poverty regardless of guilt?

Mr. Bernard Shaw, for instance, has this passage (preface to Major Barbara):—

'The crying need of the nation is not for better morals, cheaper bread, temperance, liberty, culture, redemption of fallen sisters and erring brothers, nor the grace, love, and fellowship of the Trinity; but simply for enough money. And the evil to be attacked is not sin, suffering, greed, priestcraft, kingcraft, demagoguery, monopoly, ignorance, drink, war, pestilence, nor any other of the scapegoats which reformers sacrifice, but simply poverty.'

Of course what Mr. Shaw means behind all this is that the social question is now for the time an economic question. We all know that; but we are not all literary, and we distrust literary effect and the narrow unreality it is prone to; and many of us know the last Reality well; and we are familiar with huge sections of society which are to Mr. Shaw a closed book; and we have access to human hearts which shut to the coming of his cynic wit and wilful paradox acting with a slash

'Wie ein Knabe

and we know better than to gird either at the kindest philanthropy or the most solemn religion—without which the poverty of the country would have had the heads off the class Mr. Shaw belongs to long ago. We know that the economic question is not the only social question, nor indeed the chief, if we go farther back in moral realism than Mr. Shaw's divining power can carry him. Nor is the social question the only one—unless where it is said that the only personal relations in existence are those between man and man, and we have none with a living God of an everlasting and exigent righteousness.

The passage is quite characteristic of Mr. Shaw's hard and monocular vision as a pedant of actuality; and it places him in the same mental category as the orthodoxists who preach no more than a salvation from hell. They have both the same order of moral mind, only in the one case it takes a theo-gratitude at best when the end has been reached? If He is there chiefly to help to realise human ideals, and is valuable chiefly to that end, where is His value, His place, when the end is reached? When man is his own king and providence shall the kingship of God be kept but in a museum?

The practical result of the humanitarian idea of God of which I spoke appears expressly in the attitude and address of many of the working class to the churches. 'Have you a God who commands you to put your resources wholly at the service of the humanitarian ideas for which we stand? If not, we have no use for you; nor for any God who does not. You and your God are of use to the world only as they promote our ideals. For we are the vanguard of Humanity, nay, the tribunal; and we represent to-day the chief and only cause of a humane God. The world, history, is resolved into one great battle. This battle is the divine Armageddon. This is the Lord's real controversy. We stand on one side, our opponents on the other. And we stand for the Lord's side. God's supreme interest in the world or the soul is that the victory should be ours. If you do not join us you are a false church with a false God. You are on the world's side and not on God's, not on Christ's.'

I confess I am not surprised when I hear the Trades Unionists, and especially the Socialists, talk like that. It is just what a man like Mr. Keir Hardie might be expected to say, what he ought to say, what the humanitarian anthropocentric God of the churches of last century compels him to say. There is no doubt in my mind that the best social interests of Humanity at the moment do lie along the line which gives the working people what they have not yet—their due share in the products of their labour and the blessings of society. And if the supreme function of a God is to advance Humanity, to develop and adjust its social resources, and to beam upon the prospect of some closing cycle rich in public good and personal culture; if the supreme function of a God is to be such a helper, such a benefactor, such a saviour, such a promoter of humane ideals in every direction—if that is what a God is there for, then such language to the Church from the working class is entirely in place. The working class is turning upon the Church with fair effect the idea of God the pulpit has been promoting—the kind Father. The Church of such a God, if it be the supreme organ of God's purpose on earth, should place itself and all its resources on the democratic side, and enter the arena of the class war in force. He is not then the Lord and Judge of Labour exactly as He is of Capital.

The attitude of the working classes to the Church is just what was bound to result from the God of a mere social service, the God offered especially by the churches nearest these classes for the last half century at least; and happily offered, if it were not made all.

But the God of the Church's revelation is not an anthropocentric God. Heaven is not Humanity glorified, even by a God. The public is not the tribunal of the Church. The revelation in Christ entrusted to the Church reveals God for whom man exists, rather than man for whom God exists. What God does for man is to replace him in absolute obedience to God—the obedience of entire trust and communing love. The redemption is a redemption from all the cultures, comforts, and happinesses, into the worship and service of the Holy One who here and now inhabits Eternity. The Church is there not in the first place for the service of man, but for his service, witness, and worship of the God in Whose holy love alone man comes to himself and achieves his destiny. All the development of Humanity, all the adjustment of classes and of wealth, is there for the final purpose of reconciling man's soul to God; and the crown of human welfare is that man should love and worship God for His holy Self, and not as an asset of supreme value for human weal. Human weal is not assured till we find it in forgetting about it by comparison with our practical confession and communion of God's holy love and glorious majesty and blessed kingdom. The Church is there to secure such a God in man's heart and service, not to guarantee the alliance of such a God with the human cause.

It has been a chivalrous feature in Independency that it has always been to the front when it was a case of rousing and helping a new movement of the Spirit, or promoting a healthy reaction against some idea which had done its work and outstayed its use. The light-armed organisation of the body, and its looseness to tradition, have made such adaptation more easy; and its rapport with the public gave it a quick sensibility for the new movements while they were as yet in the air on their wireless way. It has had a spiritual telepathy, which yet had a very sound, positive foundation, and a saving good sense in religious things. It is a high virtue that, amid all its sympathy with the valuable novelties and liberties of last century, as a body it should still be evangelical both in creed and tone. It has shown a happy insight and sound flair for the things that should be shaken and the things that should remain. It has been hospitable to the future, respectful to the past, and faithful to the present. Its sympathies have been true to both the old Gospel and the new knowledge. It has not always seen their adjustment (to-day that is often very hard to see); but it has trusted One Who does see it and, what is more, Who holds it, and, what is most, Who is the common Peace. It is easy to harden up as champions to the right hand or to the left; it is not easy to stand angelic with a foot on the land and one on the sea, and having done all to stand. It had been easy to stand where the eighteenth century stood and not budge; and it had been easy to become fluid with the nineteenth and stand not at all. But it has not been easy to stay rooted like a great tree which yet is flexible to all winds, and is more secure than a tower because it has the power to yield. To the note of liberty which filled last century Independency has responded well. What is the new note, and how shall it respond there?

The new need created for the soul by its new liberty is an authority. Liberty is most valuable because it gives new value, new meaning and opportunity to the true authority. The very extravagances of liberty carry home to us new resources in authority, a wider sense of its blessing, and a deeper note in its worship. They enlarge to us the range of its noble rule. A century of the passion to be free only prepares for another with the passion to serve, and the hunger for a king. An age of pity is bound to rouse the demand for an Almighty who is capable of effective pity, and pity for a whole race. An age of reform and redress is bound to set the soul upon asking what provision there is to remedy the wrong that runs through the heart of existence; and it stirs the quest for a righteousness absolute and eternal, in a word, holy. The more men learn to prize love the more must they ask at last if man is loved as men can love; and if he is loved with a love so holy and mighty that it has the right to command all, the grace to save all, and the power to subdue all. The more we enlarge and expand, so much the longer are the arms we stretch to the throne, and the deeper is the prayer we lift to its power. The more we may go where we please the more we feel we need a guide, and finally an obedience; being tired with an unchartered freedom and crushed with the load of chance desires. If our late passion was liberty, and our present is sympathy, our coming passion is authority¹. But an authority which carries all blessing and freedom with it. It is an authority acting in a sympathetic atmosphere of loyalty generated in a social body of a Church. And it is an authority of Gospel whose nature it is to create freedom; for our freedom is one we do not win, but it is given us by our absolute authority. OUR GENIUS IS A FOUNDED FREEDOM.

This alters greatly the situation, and especially for the Church. And it will give a great advantage to such churches as are most freely sure of their Gospel and their commission. Every church, in so far as it is a true church, must welcome the change which turns the question of the age from a freedom to an authority that creates freedom. For to every true church the note of authority must be uppermost. To put liberty, which is a secondary matter, before authority, which is a primary and fontal even for liberty itself, is to confess a sect and not a church.

Those who have had the patience to follow me with any sympathy will not suggest that I think for a moment of the authority of a church as residing anywhere except in the message it has in trust. It is not a case of prerogative or privilege—in the common and sometimes unworthy sense of such words. It is nothing of what Gladstone used to call 'that base-born word prestige.' It is not the prophet that commands but his Word, not the priest but the sacrifice, not the Church but the Cross, not the saint but the Saviour. The religion of the eighteenth century was truly in dire need of that note of sympathy and intimacy so freely given it by the nineteenth. But no less does the nineteenth century need from the twentieth the restoration to Fatherhood of the idea of sovereignty, and to love its eternal holiness, whereby it not only suffers to save but suffers judgment and not grief alone. As I have said, pity and sympathy only become religious when they are joined to a righteousness which is almighty to save into its own holiness. Are the tears in things the tears over Jerusalem? Are they the tears of the Holy Love as Redeemer? Are they the sweat of the saving agony of Almighty God? We do not ask, is He willing to save, but, is He able to save, and to save to the uttermost? Has He more power to save than we have to feel? Has He more right to reign than we have to pray? Have we, perhaps, been inverting things? Has His love made Him more lovely to us than commanding? Does any one know what holiness is who is more sensible of the beauty of it than humbled with its majesty and abased with its judgment? Is it God's love when we are so affected by the kindness of it that we have lost power to feel its solemnity and cherish but a cheery faith? Is it the liberty in Christ when we feel more free than obedient, and more released than ruled? Yet to canonise liberty in place of sanctity is to come to that. It is a searching question for any church, 'Which stirs your heart most—liberty or holiness ?' And a truthful answer might be crushing.

The word of the Church is not that of a merciful God, but of a God who has power to make His mercy conquer all for His holy glory in our joy. It is a word of human freedom only because it is the Word of the creative freedom of God. It did not come to tell us we are free but to make us free, and therefore to make our freedom dependent on its Maker's redeeming act. It is the word of an absolute authority, whose holy love alone has moral power to liberate the world. To believe otherwise, or to believe anything short of this, is to become more libertarian than evangelical, to centre on man rather than on God, to be more concerned for the freedom of the subject than the freedom of the king. This may be sound politics but is religious ruin ; it practically makes God to be the servant of man's freedom more than man the glory of God's. And to remain churches our liberty must regain the primacy of love's holy, authoritative, and sovereign note.

This is the line of progress, the line that Independency must take if it is to retain for the coming age the sympathetic and divining power which made it forward to meet the need of the aspiring age now passing away. It must be even more sure and ready with the note of authority than it was with the note of liberty, with the authority that creates spiritual liberty than with the liberty that creates a social authority. It must be bound to its free Gospel, and it must be more sure of the Gospel than of the freedom, else its liberty becomes a cant. If it look to the Gospel God will see to the freedom. If we seek first the freedom of His grace He will see to our liberty of thought, speech, and action. Can we offer the world an authority as real as other churches and more free ? The hour has come when, for the sake of the world's true freedom, the Church must convey first the authority of God, and make it welcome and effective for faith and conduct. That is the first need of the time, and it is also the first note of the Church. And the Church therefore is more happily situated than when the world's first demand was but the freedom which is the Church's second charge. What is entrusted to the Church is not simply redemption, far less mere emancipation ; but it is redemption by the Holy, and redemption into His holiness, the redemption of society into that obedience in a kingdom, and into the freedom that waits only upon such obedience.

Has Independency anything in the nature of this authority to offer the world ? Is ours a founded freedom ? If not its day is done. It cannot mediate in industrial strife. No church now can—though it can teach in time of peace the principles that do mediate. But if it cannot mediate in the vast schism that both rends the soul in itself, and tears it from its true Lord and His obedience, it has no mission left. What it has to bring to Humanity is not a great asset but a great control, not man's ally but man's Lord and his God. It stands in the midst of the democracy, but it stands with God's Word to command the democracy quite as much as to rally it. Has it such a commanding creating Word? If it have such a Word can it be anything but what I have said? Not a Bible, not a Church, not a courage, nor a comfort, nor a stimulus, nor an ideal, but that—the Gospel of a God of holy love, with such right and such a redemption as leaves us not our own at all, and makes our total obedience our only pride.

THE GENESIS AND GENIUS OF INDEPENDENCY

MAY I gather up what has been said, even if I repeat while I reinforce? The early Independency, we have seen, rested on two large elements in general, and on certain factors of these in particular. In general it rested, first, on Calvinism, and, second, on that movement which, according to our taste, we shall call the cadet branch, the poor relation, or the camp-follower of the Reformation, described in a single term as Anabaptism. It did not draw directly from the Lutheran wing. Luther mortgaged Protestantism (under whatever necessity) when he dropped the Independency that at first seemed, even to himself, the direct corollary of his faith, and put his movement under the aegis of the princes of the day. Calvin offered much more support to a self-governing Church, and we have been used to think that Independency was born from Calvinism alone. That we have seen to be a mistake. It was when Calvinism was mingled with what was best in the free spirit of Anabaptism, now in England risen from its martyrdom and purified of its socialism, that it founded the Independency which brought the Reformation to its own in the public history of the world's freedom and progress.

The Anabaptist element in Independency has been discussed with some fulness. It is of immense importance, and has been very singularly overlooked or scorned, even in Independency itself. We may here only recall that its theological principle was one which to-day is the source of much keen conflict and anxiety with us. It was the Spirit, or the Christian consciousness, as something co-equated with the Word; co-equated and therefore entitled to be critical of it. Whereas it proceeds only from the Word—proceeding in such a way that the Gospel is immune from any attack by its own spirituality come of age, and is independent of any authority outside itself through its experienced miracle of the new creation. If we say that the theology of Modernism (Protestant or Catholic) is a psychological theology of the faith, and the theology of orthodoxy a historical theology of the facts, and if we find neither of these tenable alone, we may speak of a positive theology of the fact within faith. It is historic in that it turns on God's eternal act of salvation in time, and psychological in that it has no religious meaning except as it enters and creates the new consciousness of the saved. What we really rally to is not the facts of the Bible or Church, but their central, creative, and therefore controlling fact—the Gospel in living power.

The Calvinistic element in Independency was in detail fourfold. It involved—

1. Predestination;
2. An infallible Bible;
3. A real sense of the Church, and the ecclesiastical finality of its first century form;
4. Christ in His Word and Spirit.

1. Too much cannot be made of the predestination idea for the history of civil and religious freedom. It is but a young and amateur revolt that thinks the connection absurd. Modern democracy owes itself to Calvin. It had an Anabaptist mother, but he is its spiritual father. Beyond history it arose in the theology of the decrees of God. The soul's certainty of its direct predestination—that was what both created and controlled the personalism (sinking into the individualism) which has been the mainspring of modern democracy. From England the influence went to America; and the foundation of the greatest republic the world ever saw rebounded upon France (though, alas, without the control), and did more than even Rousseau to frame the ideas of its Revolution.

2. As to the infallible book, here again it is easy for the neophyte to make merry with such an idea to-day. But it is hard to see what could have taken the place of that idea when the infallible Church had fallen, and the faith of an infallible Gospel had not yet ascended to its place—as indeed it has not now.

3. With the infallible book was bound up, in those unhistorical days, the idea of the finality of the first century, especially as to Church order. We have learned differently, though our weakest point is still our historic sense. But at least the error carried with it what we rapidly lose—a real sense of the Church as the supernatural, and therefore the mightiest, society on earth.

4. And in respect of the old consciousness of the presence of Christ with such a Church in His redeeming Word and Spirit, there would be some variety of opinion to-day as to the sense in which the words should be taken, as will appear.

When we enumerated these (or other such) elements which went to the making of Independency we were not yet done. So great a world power could not be a mere compound of previously existing elements. It was not a mere amalgam, nor a mere product. In recent thought it is doubted if any effect is but the exhibition of something that was already in the cause, whether in every effect there is not something original and peculiar to itself. And the dubious axiom is more than doubtful when we are in the moral region of the historical world. In our present connection we had to face the question why these elements, all of which had long been at work abroad before Independency became a power here, did not produce the same effect there; why there has been no Nonconformist Independency in the Protestantism of the Continent. And we had therefore to reckon in another and original factor, the special contribution of the English genius for liberty and self-government, which provided the one medium in which all these Reformation elements could combine fruitfully and firmly for the public and progressive liberty of the world, both in its promotion and its control.

But now let us continue our inquiry as to what our present position and prospects are in view of our original constituents, on the one hand, and of our public and historic service on the other. Do we preserve these constituents? If we do not, are we therefore disempowered for continuing the work in the world which they enabled our fathers to do? Theirs has been a tremendous work when we measure it by the whole value of its fruit in civil and religious liberty—a work which chiefly enables the Church to claim the paternity of modern freedom. Does it exhaust our vocation? Is it our one work in the world? Were we raised up but for this, and, having done it, should we regard it as enough for any one section of the Church to have contributed to Humanity; and may we honourably retire, cultivate our own garden, and pass the great tasks of the future to other hands? Do we now linger on, as Judaism has long and not ignobly done since it produced the one Liberator of the Soul? Where we were once a world power, with effects indelible and inexhaustible in history, are we now to be but a little clan left with a great relic, a sect living on great memories with little ways, saying small things with a loud insignificant voice, and repeating historic words as a class recites history? Are we going into dock only to be kept in good order and great honour, as the Victory lies in Portsmouth harbour, towed to her last berth—Nelson's deck now left by Nelson's power? Are we the pensioned remnant of a world conquest?

To that question it might first be answered thus. We might refer to the fact that even out of the eighteenth century a second world conquest was inaugurated by Independency, when its political and social victory was well afloat and able to go of itself. The Congregationalists and Baptists were again the pioneers of a world idea which was waiting in the Church for a fit organ to give it hands and feet. More than a century ago they were the founders of modern missions, and of all that these have come to mean and to promise since then. Truly it needed but the lead, the one word to let loose the gathered waters, and the other churches were quickly on the field. I only wish to trace the persistency in Independency of a certain world-mission, an evangelical imperialism, its service to that side of Christianity which has charge of its ecumenical freedom and progress on a firm and permanent base of Gospel. The true ecumenical is the evangelical. I may also use the opportunity in passing to recall the fact that the plantations of the Commonwealth were missionary enterprises in Cromwell's intention. And, further, that the Pilgrim Fathers went out not only to seek their own freedom of worship, but to spread into savage lands (alas, at points in a too savage way!) the power of the Gospel. As it was said in a document of the time, they went 'from an inward zeal and great hope of laying some foundation, or making way for propagating the kingdom of Christ to the remote ends of the earth; though they should be but stepping-stones to others.' The missionary passion, the passion for liberty, and the passion of the Gospel, all go together; though in practice one may outrun the rest for a particular age.

But a reference to our part in modern missions is no sufficient answer to the question we have raised. We may still be told that we have no monopoly of missions, that the state of our missions is somewhat unsatisfactory, and that, like other churches, we do not rise to the opportunities we once had power to create. Did our churches not originate that enterprise under conditions which have now disappeared? In the changes of belief and interest that have taken place have we parted with the sources of our effective power both for political and evangelical progress?

Certainly the change is great, and we have parted with much that made our fathers what they were and determined what they did. Taking the four elements I have enumerated we have parted with the place of doctrine in life, and especially with the doctrine of predestination as Calvin had it. We have parted with the old position of the Bible, and certainly with the idea of an infallible Bible as our fathers understood it, for some better thing. We have parted with the ecclesiastical finality of the New Testament age and stage. We do not claim for Independency divine right as being the polity consecrated and embalmed for all time in the New Testament. And we are tempted to part with a real sense of a Church as distinct from any other association for religious purposes. We do not draw a red line between Church and World; membership does not register a passage from death to life; the Church has not a life as autonomous as that of the world; and we are more prone to adopt the methods of the world for the Church than to impose the principles of the Church on the world. In regard to the presence of Christ with the Church in His Word and Spirit, there are signs that this is, for certain churches, a piece of their theology rather than the principle of their practice. The relation between the historic Christ and His Spirit is often far from clear. The Church of the Spirit claims the right, in many places, to sit in judgment on the Christ of the Word. And the Anabaptist detachment and co-equation of Word and Spirit is the active principle in many who take the matter so slightly that they may complain that they do not know what the phrase means.

The question, therefore, is this—If these doctrines or principles made and inspired the Independency in whose creative place for the modern world we take our pride, do they make also its continuity; and can Independency continue to thrive with like aim or a like effect without them? It is a twofold question. Can Independency go on to live without positive doctrine in prominent place? Can any church form a real unity except on the basis of what it believes in common? Can a subjective sympathy unite a church as a common object of faith does? And, if Independency is bound up with positive Christian doctrine, does it rest upon any doctrine or principle which is not equally represented by other churches which have perhaps better machinery for giving it effect?

If we attempt to answer that question in either form we must fall back on the fourth factor of those I named, and take stand on the saving and ruling presence of Christ with us in His Word and Spirit; and on that as understood in a special way which has our large old Independent outlook, but turns it on the future rather than the past.

There is no doubt that the great world problem for the future of the reformed churches is their union. The union of the churches and the conditions that realise it make a far more urgent task for us at the moment than the direct conquest of the world's opposition, whether rational or practical, whether its criticism or its paganism. We shall never master the world, either apologetically or evangelically or socially we can never take the terror of life from the poor, till the churches are welded, with whatever relative independency, round some one central point which is the source of our solidary power, spiritual freedom, and ample hope. The Church's liberality of thought, or comprehension, or beneficence, must flow from its generosity of new life, from the greatness of its Gospel, and not from the range of the ideas we can associate with it. This union is the new form of the old problem so finely and eagerly pressed by Richard Baxter before its time, the old idea for which Cromwell so greatly stood in politics, in his liberal, sound, but also premature, principle of toleration for all Christians (to say nothing of Jews and Turks), so long as they did not, like the Catholics, plot against the State. The political tolerance of Cromwell took more intimate shape in Baxter as ecclesiastical comprehension; but both were on a fixed base, and were held impossible otherwise. Such men were very clear as to what was meant by a Christian. They said he was a man who, whatever views he might hold on other points, trusted to the soul-blood of Christ for the forgiveness of his sins and eternal life. With his powerful practical insight Cromwell seized on the very immortal soul of his Independency when he found the marrow of true Christianity here: 'Those who believe the remission of sins through the blood of Christ, and free justification through the blood of Christ; who live upon the grace of God; those men who are certain they be so—they are members of Jesus Christ.'—Lett., ii. 444.

The greatest problem before Independency is how to regain its place in the great world Church; and to do it, not by the ineffective way of mere sympathy, which may begin and end in sentiment, but by some way which shall make the Church a real and respected power for the practical purpose of God with society. And that we shall never do simply in the name of a Christian charity, nor in that of a Christian liberty, which alone will but make us a refuge of cranks; but only in the name of the only Authority which creates a liberty we can never force.

Now it is from this point of view that we must construe that position which I named as outlasting all the other factors that made us, and as carrying us on into the future with the word of reconciliation for the sects—'the real and ruling presence of Christ in His Word and Spirit.' Only we must give to the Word a new sense which is the soul of the old. By the Word we do not mean the Bible, we mean the redeeming Gospel which put the Bible there. And by the Spirit we mean more than a power of warm light which illuminates the book it falls on; we mean a power which issues from the altar whose cathedral the book is, and turns the living gospel Word into living and personal experience.

The historic and ultimate fact is not the Bible. The Bible, and the Bible alone, is not the religion of Protestants. Nor is it Christ in the sense of the mere phenomenon of Christ's historic personality acting impressively upon us from afar—what might be called the personalism of Jesus. But it is Christ construed in a certain way, as doing with His whole personality a certain unique and timeless thing. It is not the history of Jesus, but the Act of God and God's grace in the history of Jesus. It is Christ's person as interpreted by the New Testament, the whole New Testament Christ, and not merely what has been lightly called the Christ of the gospels. For the Christ of the gospels was a supplementary presentation of Him to churches that had been made by the gospel that fills the Epistles. It is the Christ of the apostles, Christ as self-interpreted in the apostles, Christ not simply as the perfectly divine soul, but as charged with an eternal work He had to finish, Christ as the eternal redeeming Son of God, perfect not in spiritual aspect but in moral vocation, not as character but as Redeemer. It is the whole Christ crucified, Christ with His whole historic person pointed in the Cross, Christ positivised in the Word of the Gospel, and amplified and glorified in the Spirit. It is the Lord the Spirit—the Spirit not co-equated with the Son, as if He were an independent and even corrective power, but the Spirit as coming from the Father through the work of the Son, the Spirit inseparable for saving purposes, and for the Church's life, from the Word of the Gospel, ordering and correcting all things from there, but correcting that and superseding that never. This means, of course, a repudiation of that side of our Anabaptist descent which made the Spirit another and higher dispensation than the Son.

In a word, the hope of the union of the reformed churches is in no tradition of line or succession, but in the spiritual succession alone; not by apostolical succession, but by evangelical solidarity; not as sons of Abraham, but as sons of the promise. This means a church of one article. It is the Gospel of grace and of faith in the salvation which is in Jesus Christ, the Gospel not of personality but of personality redemptive and redeemed. The centrality and sufficiency of such a gospel is the one condition of church unity. And for this church of one article we have a legacy of facilities which the other churches have not; we have a mobility on that authoritative base which is not theirs, and which appeals to the swiftness of the democratic time. We are the flying squadron, the advance guard, the democratic side of the super-democratic Church. This is our metier; not freedom of thought, not theological freedom. Pure theology has fortunately never been our goal, as I have pointed out. We do not exist for pure doctrine. But we have been set, in our English way, for the quick translation of a fundamental theology, a theological gospel, into ethical and social life.

It is not the only service to the kingdom. Other churches other lots and other tasks. The churches are complementary. But it is a great and urgent service of the pioneer sort which has always been our ideal—often misleading us, but always keeping our faces to Jerusalem, sometimes inflating us, sometimes shooting up without deepness of earth, but on the whole making us the pathfinders of the public hour. Not indeed (as I have said) the pioneers of theological development. The development of doctrine is not the chief part of the work given us to do. It was not the work given to the English Reformation, which came in Independency to its true head and effect. We were delivered in great measure from that resurgence of scholasticism which made Lutheran orthodoxy in the seventeenth and eighteenth century a new Egypt for the new Israel. We were not supremely concerned with the determination of dogma, or the culture of pure doctrine; it was with the religious, social, and political application of dogma (and of one dogma in particular, the most mighty of all for personal faith—predestination). We were called for its application as the fundamental principle of religious and social life, for the constitution of the Church by it, and then for the moulding of all social life on the principle of that eternal society. We were not, as a people, or as a section of the Church, concerned with school questions, but with questions of life, public and private, on everlasting foundations. In our day we were the Christian trustees of public progress by popular power, and the stewards of the true social genius of the Reformation, whereby Protestantism has become that blessing to the modern world which the Roman Church was to the world of the middle age. It was, I repeat, the right we asserted for every local church freely to determine and conduct its affairs that became the foundation of the public principle so great and beneficent for the modern world—the sovereignty of the people.

Upon English soil alone were the two great movements of the Reformation age adjusted and consummated—Reformers and Anabaptists; the Evangelical and the Libertarian; the Word and the Spirit; Fixity and Freedom; Faith and Inspiration; Reformation and Renovation; and it was in Independency that this most fruitful union took place. Such is our hereditary genius—not liberty alone, but the combination of positivity and liberty, of authority and progress, of security and freedom; wherein the liberty is secured by the positivity, being the freedom that flows from a given and historic Christ for every interest of mankind. We represent a free soul-faith on the base of a historic authority, with an incorrigible bias to public affairs, and the resolve to secure the establishment of the Church in the only real way—its establishment not by law but in the laws, not as a church favoured by national preference, but as the Church's Christianity glorified in national conduct.

I will approach the same matter from another side, and still from history. The Toleration Act of 1689 gave up the principle which had ruled the English Church from Henry VIII. to James II.—the principle of the essential unity of Church and State, which had taken its last expression in the Act of Uniformity in 1662. With 1689 came a principle totally different (though for long afterwards, and even to this day, very imperfectly realised in fact)—liberty of religious conviction so far as the State is concerned, the State's neutral recognition of a variety of religious communities on the foundation of the Reformation gospel. Nonconformity had been penal and without rights; it now received status, subject to a recognition of the existing government and obedience to the law. That is to say, the Puritan and Independent element, which hitherto had been within the State Church, now became a body of Dissent alongside that Church, to grow later into an army against the Church in so far as established. The great battle which had been the supreme interest of English history for a century and a half, the central conflict of the national life, had been an ecclesiastical conflict. It is inadequate to see in the long campaign but the struggles of nationalism, or even industrialism, or the slow upheaval of couches sociales. If it is not theology that has been the supreme issue of English history, it has been the practical application of theology. Can any one with such a commanding view-point believe that that warfare is now but among forgotten far-off things? But there was then ended one great stage of it—nay, the greatest. The principle at least was settled. That stage was the battle between Episcopacy and Puritanism, Institution and Faith. And Puritanism, through Independency, had won. The principle of public liberty in Christ's Gospel, which had become the historic trust and task of Independency in English history, was now substantially established—though not completely. And a great epoch was closed in the history of England and of Protestantism. The Stuarts had staked the king on the bishop and were checkmated. They identified the fate of throne and Church. And with the Church went down the throne. It was the Lord's doing. For it was the Gospel that won against the Church. This was the real English Reformation—this, and not Henry's, and not Elizabeth's. The German Reformation was not a final but a progressive thing; and it was in England that it ran its native course. The Gospel won permanently against the Church, which had ceased to be its steward; and it won by means of the sects. It was by means of the sects, with all their extravagances, that this solid and permanent conquest came. But with the winning of this victory they subsided to become more sects than they were before—less extreme, perhaps, but more of sects.

I mean it in this sense. They ceased now to have the old significance for the history of the great Church, or of collective Protestantism. They had still much work to do in consolidating their own free existence. (Much, alas! they did also in disintegrating and rending it.) They had an even vaster work to do by following up their victory in the region of political liberty, and in preparing a religious habitation for the new democracy, both in its commercialist and its industrialist stage. They developed a vigorous denominational life, and a valuable type of piety and vital godliness. But they were more universal for the State than the Church. They ceased to be an influence on the course of the world-Church. In this direction their productive power was spent. They have not, for instance, been productive in the region of theology, in the development of Protestant truth and its adjustment to the new intellectual age. They have been even appropriative in this respect but slowly. They contributed much to the detachment of English Christianity from continental, and its insular seclusion from wider influences. And they have largely lost the historic spirit and sense of continuous tradition, lost it in voluntary associations, a priori views, and immediate experiences. They do not affect the constitution of the more historic churches [see note at the end of the chapter], though they rear great young communions beside them. Nor do they now affect the political constitution in the same thorough way as in the Revolution of 1688. For though we have just seen the greatest change since then, and one in which the Nonconformists have been playing a great part, yet it is not directly as Nonconformists. The central issue with the House of Lords recently was not ecclesiastical as it was in 1688. The spearhead of the Liberal movement for the hour is not Nonconformity though it may be its backbone. And the driving power is a social rather than a religious interest—one, indeed, which often professes to despise the churches. Its leadership has passed from the churches to influences that have a loose, or even a negative, connection with them.

The churches tended, especially in the eighteenth century, to draw into themselves and become closed circles, with beliefs to correspond. The elaborate Calvinism of many of our trust-deeds is a deposit of that century, when they became free and secure enough to build; and it is a record of that scholastic debasement to orthodoxy which is apt to mark an age which has come spent out of a great conquest. If the Restoration was a vehement reaction against Puritan ethic, the orthodoxy of the eighteenth century was in extravagant reaction from the Anabaptist extravagance of the sectaries with whom Cromwell had to part. It is the same phenomenon that meets us in the early centuries of Christianity itself; and the same fate that fell on the Reformation in Germany in the seventeenth century. The divisions I have named were a result of this temper, this tendency to coagulate through standing unstirred by the greater issues of a Church. The Calvinism of that age is not the molten thought of the great age. It is Calvinism clotted, and sometimes soured. Many of the members of the churches, moreover, passed to Unitarianism (through Arianism) in one direction, and into Methodism in the other. Independency, however, was perhaps less affected in this fissiparous way than any other body, owing to its tradition of liberty upon a fixity which was central and not peripheral, fundamental and not circumstantial, evangelical rather than theological.

Dissent has thus become sectarian in respect of its contribution to the great historic Church and its unity. But sectarian with a difference—sectarian as Christianity was to the Judaism in which it rose, and not sectarian like the mystic groups of the Middle Ages. It was composed of sects that were growing into churches, and slowly preparing once more to take their place in the federal unity of that great Church to which alone is promised the conquest of the world for the kingdom of God. The idea of the Church which prevails over the greater part of the world is that of an institution whose security rests upon the integrity of a long historic tradition, an unbroken succession and a visible organisation. That idea has to be altered, and altered for the better. Another conception of the Church must be made the dominant in the world's mind. The Church must be re-defined, in the thought even of a world that stands outside it; and not as an institution, but as the society of the evangelical succession and the regenerative power. And this is a work that can only be begun by the union, the federation (not the amalgamation) of all the churches that stand on an evangelical instead of an institutional foundation on the one hand, or a subjective or rational foundation on the other. It must be done by the federate, and what has been called the charitable, action of all such reformed churches in mutual respect, confidence, and affection. This is the Church problem of the future for them.

Has the Independent tradition, then, any special part to play, any special contribution to make to this end? Others of the free churches have been doing their share in cementing their past divisions, and dressing their line before the enemy. The Baptists have done so, the Methodists have. Independency has not been split into these divisions; what then is prescribed by history for it? What tradition has it still to make good in the new situation?

Up till now, to a large extent, its work has been too negative—a very great and most necessary work, but negative after all. It has been a struggle for liberty. But mere liberty is a negative idea apart from a creative authority. And we have been doing more for liberty than for authority—with the result now of a dangerous crisis. For in a Church of the Gospel the authority that sets free must always be prior to the freedom it makes.

I said the great battle of English history was a Church conflict. It was to detach State and Church into the true freedom, and therefore the true power, of each. The principle of that separation we established in the Revolution Settlement. But the principle made slow way in detailed practice. It is still a long way from complete realisation. And ever since 1688 the Independents have been in the van of those who pursued the great national and spiritual mission of securing its effects in the Church's release from the State. But it is, after all, the negative side of the whole work. Disestablishment is but ending a wrong relation of the Church to the State; we have yet to establish the right relation. It is folly to think and live as if there were no relation. Our positive task is to establish in our country a spiritually free Church, were it but for the sake of the freedom of the State. But it is far more for the sake of a free faith, which again is there only for the sake of a free grace.

Now the negative part of this work—Disestablishment—has passed, or is passing, out of our hands. It has become an essential question of practical politics, the politics of a whole composite party, largely, of course, made up of ourselves in our civic capacity. We have committed it to the hands of faithful men, who will see that it come to pass in the interests of civil liberty and public equality. This is another of those interests or tasks which, like education, or the care of the poor, were created and reared by the Church, but are now passed over to the charge of society, as a prime interest of its own.¹

But the other, the positive, side, the establishment in the heart and affairs of society of a church

¹ The like applies to liberal thought. That passes to the care of the State Universities. Even in theology this is so. There ought to be facilities for the cultivation of thought and knowledge absolutely free in religious matters. And it is in a university that these should exist. They cannot in a church. For a church is there for a free gospel, and not for free research. The word 'free' does not mean the same thing in each case. The Church has a gospel in first trust which limits the intellectual freedom within it to what does not destroy that gospel. The university can have no such limitation. For the Church the gospel is final, for the schools nothing can be final. The one aims at a free soul, the other at free thought. The Church may and must accept the results of free thought, but only up to the point when they destroy a free gospel. The final must then send the non-final back for revision and more experience—especially more experience of the religious experience itself. Free thought lies as a first charge, therefore, not on the Church but on the university; and those churches which have been cherishing it as a special trust, and which think the Church should not be behind the schools in this kind of freedom, must come to see that it is not the freedom for which a Church exists, but that it must be counted among the things that, through its universities, a State can do better, because it is its proper work.

free for the service of Christ, for free grace and the final kingdom—that is now borne in upon us with an urgency that balances this release on the negative side. The less we need to be a protesting church, so much the more we must realise a catholic church; and the more must we present the true catholicity to the world, and on that base the true unity. What special service, then, is Independency in a position to render to this task of the future, this task of converting the world's idea of Catholicism from the hierarchical to the evangelical (even while rescuing it from many evangelicals)? Something is very specially incumbent on Independency here. It was the chief influence in calling the modern democracy into being; it is debtor to correspond in the matter of its guidance. Now Independency alone cannot guide the democracy. For one thing, it is in practice too dependent on it. But indeed no mere section of the Church can be such a guide to a whole phase of civilisation—only the Church as a whole can, and the Church as the apostle of a final and authoritative gospel which is universal in its permeating as well as its co-ordinating power. Only a united Church has the promise to control that whole democracy which a sectional Church had the commission to create. And only a Church can which is the apostle of the gospel of man's new unity in Christ. That is the only true apostolic succession—the creative legacy of Gospel power and of the Holy Ghost. The Gospel of Christ in a united Church is the only influence that can mould the fierce democracy to the kingdom of God. Of course if the democracy has other ideals than the kingdom of God it will seek other means than the Gospel of realising them. But that is our positive power. Our idealism has served and impelled us well—till it become our sole religion. But then it breaks down. For the constant tendency of idealism, especially in a minority and in opposition, is that it becomes too exclusively negative and critical. It then carps, rasps, and bites. In the history of thought, to say nothing of politics, mere idealism becomes but critical idealism. It is not constructive. It is to the front only at question time, and it is apt to become a source of more diversion than effect. This will always be the weakness of mere idealism, either in thought or affairs. It cannot create. It cannot create or sustain a social body to be its engine. It falls into cultured groups, sets, or intellectual fashions. It becomes a cult of culture—at its moral best, of personality, at its worst, of fads. It is not a gospel, and therefore it cannot make a church. Such is the criticism of clear-eyed idealists on their own idealism; and they feel the enormous, the infinite, advantage possessed by even an impossible orthodoxy in its power to make and carry on a church because it has a gospel. We are neither orthodoxists nor mere idealists. We are Gospellers. We are Churchmen. We believe in the churches, in the Church. Well, what special service can we render in turning the churches into the Church, in enabling the churches to do for the public what the Church alone can do, not in erasing the churches by a church, but in federating them into the Church?

The question, therefore, which becomes for us of first importance is the positive one. And it concerns not only our contribution to personal religion, or to social welfare, but to the whole Church in the whole world. Now the Church is a historic body; it is not simply an accidental and voluntary body in the sense of being whatever any group or age may choose to make it, without reference either to theological reality or historic tradition. To answer our question positively, therefore, means that we ask what the problem is which is set up by the history we inherit—European and national. Every great movement (like the Reformation) has been great not simply because it preached a certain idea, but because it put it in the terms of the question as history had raised it, and answered that question. It was to the great medieval question that Luther gave an answer so great. Now it has been pointed out already that the political genius of our English history and constitution has taken the form of an ecclesiastical conflict. Our stable and model liberty has arisen from a prolonged struggle between State and Church. But it would be a shallow mistake to treat the struggle simply as a long effort on the part of the State to shake off the Church, or of the Church to settle on the neck of the State. Such a view savours too much of village, platform, or press polemic. The classic period of the conflict was from Henry VIII. to William III. The two powers to it were Church and State. And there were two ideas as to their relation. One was represented by Episcopacy and its establishment. It bound a certain form of Church polity in the closest way with the polity, policy, and institutions of the nation; and it gave the Church, by its national place and power, a place and influence also in the great history of the West. It continued the medieval intimacy of the Church with great affairs, and it did so in a way more successful than any arrangement the Middle Ages reached abroad. The other of these ideas was represented by Puritanism, ending in Nonconformity. It took its start not from the idea of the nation, nor even from a corporate church, but from the inwardness, spirituality, and freedom of the redeemed soul. Its social unit was a community, not an institution. Its church was the community of the saints. It was thus that it strove to carry out the Reformation principle, and realise the idea of the Church unseen. Its whole contention came to turn on the autonomy and value of the local community. Its problems were not theological so much as practical. Independency erased the distinction between the theologian and the layman more completely than any other. No church was so little a church of its ministers, influential as these were. It was influence that they had, and not power. The priesthood of all believers here first became practical and effective for church life. It created the reality of Christian freedom by the divine place it secured for the Christian individuality. A man became a man because he was his own priest in Jesus Christ. The voluntary principle became the whole principle of English Nonconformity. Truly it frayed out on its edges to mere atomism and petty schism; but what a value it has had for personal piety, for practical Christianity, and especially for the infusion of Christian ethic into political life.

These were the two ideas that struggled with each other to regulate the relation of Church and State. Which of them gives more promise of power to christianise the State, or the national conduct at least? Neither, perhaps, can look for absolute victory in what of the battle is yet to come. Each represents an element essential to the whole case. I have already said that we cannot simply sever Church and State and leave them lying apart. We cannot proceed as if there were no relation between them. We cannot cleave the soul in that way, especially when it is occupied with its greatest interests, and most especially with its supreme interest in the unity of God. The unity of the soul itself, and therefore of the Christian life, prescribes some form of unity, of polarity, between Church and State. Simple and absolute severance is too summary, too abstract, and too negative. We all feel that more or less. Some of the extremest separatists are also among those who would most directly and impatiently apply the principles, and even the pressure, of the Christian Church to political society, and especially to political action. And so alongside of the strife of the two ideas in our history there has from time to time appeared a third, which took the shape of some effort at union among the reformed churches for the purpose of bringing the pure and powerful influences of an inward

Christianity to bear upon national life and affairs. Such was Baxter's effort, wonderfully welcome but not finally successful; or the movement which preceded the Savoy conference. Had they succeeded, we might have seen the finest triumph of Protestantism—some arrangement which should do justice both to the long tradition of the Church's constitution, and also to the reformed freedom of the single community and of the spiritual soul. The attempt was doomed to failure at that day. The fatal involution of the Episcopate with the monarchy arrested it on the one side; and, on the other, the Reformation principles were not yet clearly adjusted—the true relation between history and the soul, between the Word and the Spirit, between the Bible and the Christian conscience, between the formal and the material principle of Protestantism. Each side was still too extreme. And within Protestantism itself, within Independency, there was that isolation and over-pressing of the Christian consciousness, that exaggeration of the material principle of subjective faith, that dream of being free by casting loose from all historic and objective authority, even in Scripture—a liberty unmoored and uncharted, a freedom which gnaws out its own interior, and leaves it the prey of unrest without object and of action without end.

Baxter's problem is in abeyance, but it is not solved. Our negative success has not yet made us quite realise our positive task for the public, or take ourselves in hand most earnestly for its achievement. The Church must be a power with the State. How? For it is the only organ of Christianity when we come to action upon our national society, as, indeed, upon human society altogether. The glance we have just cast upon our history may indicate the nature of this positivity, so desirable, so necessary.

We may let ourselves be reminded that when Independency conquered it was not its programme that prevailed, nor its policy, it was its principle. The Commonwealth went down; and Congregationalism has not become the one form of free church life. It was the idea, the genius, of Independency that survived, that has secured so much liberty for the congregation even in churches closely connectional, that has worked in the world quite apart from our churches, and has gained the greatest of modern victories in the supreme sovereignty of the people.

How is it with the other power—the Episcopal Church taken as the National? Is it otherwise? Is there not an idea, a genius, a principle there? Have we not just been obliged to own it? Have we not seen that it is impossible for a church like the Christian to be absolutely out of relation to the national life and its public conduct ; that a society so great, living, and ethical as the Church must have a close and powerful influence of a practical kind on the great life of politics and the State ; that its principles ought to become the ethical principles of a State which rises in the moral scale ; that the Christian principle in trust of the Church should control public behaviour, if not in the same form, yet as surely as with private life ? That, or something like that, is the inner principle of establishment behind its empirical form. The State is not pagan. It is not material. It has a soul. And it ought to have a Christian soul. And it ought to express it—if not in worship or privilege, yet in public law, conduct, and history. Individualism, conventicism, sectarianism, do not represent the due position of Christianity in State or nation, nor its due respect from either. They do not give effect to the Christian kingdom of God. If all members of the State were Christians by conversion, as the old Church continues to hold they are by baptism, then there would be, by their moral Gospel, a very vital and urgent relation between the Church of their conversion and the State of their affairs. That is the permanent idea of the Established Church, amid all its obvious failure to make the nation really Christian, all the injustice of its actual position ; this is the idea permanent amid all the change that has been, or may be, in the form that establishment takes—the close and powerful connection of Christianity, through the Church, with the national life and its greatest expressions in act. Our denationalisation has cost us so much that it has left us without power to realise how much.

And that effective influence is what the free churches must somehow ensure under the conditions of spirituality, equality, and autonomy. The Church as free must do what the Church as established has failed to do for this idea. It must do more to christianise the State and its politics, civil and foreign. And it cannot do this except by its own internal union. The State, the nation, will not be christianised towards God's Kingdom by competitive sects, but only by a federate Church of one Gospel for one Humanity. And there is no foundation, no secret, for this union but that we should repair, with a new straitness, intensity, and power, to the central Gospel which gives us our right to be, and to be free ; that we should neglect everything else in comparison with the confession and declaration of that gospel, in such forms of expression, practical or theological, as may be prescribed by the forces and necessities of the time ; and that our unity must lie in our confession of the mighty truth in our charge before it can take any effect as co-operation in the good works waiting to be done.

Our great positive task, therefore, is not social reform, political pressure, or philanthropic energy, but something which empowers and fertilises all these. It is not even evangelisation, in the current sense of the word. It is effective union of the federal, and not the imperial, kind, of the devolutionary kind, and not the centralised; convergent only on the common, but moralised, gospel of churches which are complementary in their action under that centripetal faith. It is only on such union that we can base a united moral effect on the world.

This is a matter so great and vital to us and to society that it is worth while to dwell on it, and turn it round at fresh angles. What is the modern affair that lies nearest to the concern of any church? What at the moment is the supreme interest of the Church within the world? What is the greatest gift it can give the world? What is its prime condition for reaching the world? It is its own union.

And how is such a union of the Church to come to pass? Not by reorganisation of machinery, and not by combination for humane or ethical effect, but by renovation in the spirit of its mind and the quality of its Gospel. 'Say not ye,

A confederacy, a confederacy. The Lord of Hosts Him shall ye sanctify,' as He has revealed Himself in His saving will for a moral world. The union which is the one thing needful at the hour, the one pressing thing the Church owes the world, can only grow from its concentration, on its creative base, on the one positive Gospel which makes a Church a Church; and this even to the comparative neglect for the hour, if need be, of all that is but circumference to that. When Baxter moved for union, the distinction was introduced, which has since played so great a part among us, between fundamentals and circumstantials. And his fundamental, Presbyterian as he was, was the fundamental professed by Independency alone, as expressed in Milton, Cromwell, and even the sects. It was no theme of scholastic theology, and no fabric of speculative dogmatic. It was ethical, spiritual, experimental. 'Not the head makes the Christian, they said, but the heart'—meaning thereby not the affectionate nature, nor a promiscuous charity, but the heart stablished by grace upon man's moral reconciliation to God by the death of Jesus Christ. They stood not upon the natural affections turned on God, but upon the 'gracious affections' of the new creation. This was the rock both of the soul and of the Church. To this all else was circumstantial. For this all else was free. All sects which thus held the head should be tolerated by the State and recognised by each other. Within that, 'difference in religion should not be a different religion,' as Burroughs said in his Irenicum. Within that, differences did not represent different lines, but different angles of vision. Whoever was there had, by that confession, an equal right and place with every other in the Church of Christ. The free conscience among men, man's central and active freedom from men, was secured on the foundation of a conscience free by Christ with God. We were never free without the absolute authority of a redeeming Christ. With this all was free, and from this all else would flow. "Necessary doctrines are not at all hard, nor require long time to learn. For the Word of God having once planted this truth in the understanding, viz. that it is the blood of God which cleanseth us from all sins—this evangelical truth of its own nature would instantly set man on work to do the will of Him that so loved him." So speaks a writing of the period. It is the rediscovery of the fundamental principle of the Reformation, as so familiarly put by Melancthon, but never before practically realised by the Reformers. Independency was the first section of the Church deliberately to take this for the principle of Church union, and to found stability and liberty, first for Church and then for State, on one article which is the heart and spring of all else. Men, they said, may ruin themselves, this truth they could never ruin. They strove always to get back to the centre, to refer all the doctrines that made the sects to one trunk principle, which should be the fundamental statement of Christianity, and would give an equal right and protection to all who owned it in whatever variety. They found it in the reconciliation of man effected by God in the atoning death of Christ. And this practical faith became their one criterion of the Christianity either of a soul or a church, and the source of their liberty, first ecclesiastical and then political. Our very national, our political liberty was made by these men, and it thus has at last nothing but an evangelical base.

Have we no duty to this tradition? Have we none of this legacy left to invest in modern affairs? Have we nothing but the echo of barren and negative freedom? Have we not rather a hereditary leadership of a positive kind in the direction in which the churches should most urgently go? The leadership the religious age requires is not in the matter of liberty. That victory is practically won. It is in the matter of a rallying and creative authority. Have we any power to lead in this new need and demand of the age? Has Independency nothing in its tradition which commends and commits it to the forward service of an age whose demand has so changed? Are we taken quite aback and found resourceless by the new requirement of the modern world? Have we nothing but the old tune of liberty to grind out in the market-place, like blind men who play the songs of boyhood, and cannot read any more the quest in the faces of those who hurry by? Has this liberty become itself the modern orthodoxy, which enslaves us to its dry jangle of traditional phrase? Have we become mere ἐλευθερόδουλοι, slaves of liberty, and echoes of originality? Have we no power or liberty to tell the world above all else what we are free for, or how we are free? Are we only free to stand aside from the churches that can do so, and talk hypocritically of their bondage? Can the liberty of Independency to-day do nothing to lead in pressing upon all the Protestant Churches the uniting idea of a federate Church of one living article, declaratory and not exclusory, whose experience gives the Church at once its rock and its range, its ground and its freedom; one article which clearly tells both its own catechumens and a world in arms what the Church is; one article which has in it the inspiration of the Church's service, the condition of its co-operation, the secret of its security, and on whose base its liberty also should be established and protected from attacks either upon its exercise or its honour? The Church of the future must guarantee these two things, security and liberty, and establish them for the moral and spiritual soul. There is nothing which society at large so much needs as these two things, one growing from the other, which are the very being of the Christian society. Will the Church never show the world that it has the power of liberty without breaking away into sects, or the power of security without hardening up into dogma? Has it no liberty but what dissolves its own base, and no security but what petrifies its liberty? As one Church, has it one truth, which is both its revelation and its inspiration, its law and impulse in one, one Gospel which, like God Himself in making man, gives the Church its freedom by the act of its creation? Is there any section of the Church whose tradition points that way to the extent that Independency does? Has it not a hereditary duty of such hegemony? It is not a question whether Independency should do this for its own sake. The times have advanced beyond a point of view so sectarian. The question is removed and lifted to the range of all the free churches and their union. That union can only be on the base of an explicit gospel. Is it not our traditional right, not, indeed, to reign over our brethren, far less to boast, but to carry the standard in their great procession, and renew to the world the testimony of our classic age, the witness of wide comprehension on the foundation of a positive gospel which is not a legal creed, but a worshipping confession? Other churches may have facilities for other things, such as social experiments, and organic enterprise. Have we not the tradition and secret of founded freedom? Has Independency, in both its branches, not an ancestral aptitude and a historic commission to invite the sister churches of the reformed faith to rally into one federate Church of this Gospel, so simple, profound, and intimate, so free from bondage because so bound to the cross of our redemption, so hospitable to the higher criticism because so secured by grace in the great judgment, so ripe with social blessing because so brotherly in a world reconciliation?

A very great effect was produced upon the world, and especially upon Anglicanism, by the publication of the Free Church Catechism, with its revelation of a massive and common belief. Still greater would be the effect of such a declaration in one article by all the free churches as their term of corporate communion. It could be declaratory only, to characterise and not delimit, for description and not for subscription, for confession and not for exclusion, with moral and not legal value, a covenant for the churches and a badge for their teachers rather than a test for their members, a reflection of the one Word which alone makes the one Church.

There is another point of view. The aspect of Church freedom which appeals most to a modern and cultured world is not so much the freedom of the Church from the State, as its freedom from its own past, freedom from orthodoxy, or from what is called external authority. Freedom of thought weighs more even than freedom of soul with a public which grows intelligent faster than it grows religious. It is an inevitable stage in the growth of a society which has just begun to taste education in large numbers, who are readily but vaguely impressed by academic, intellectualist, and æsthetic ideas. For free thought is a piece of the same intellectualism as is shown in orthodoxy, only that the one is moving, the other stationary. But however that be, there are many who are willing to put up with the drawbacks of a State Church, and do not trouble about its principle, because they think that it guarantees freedom of thought in theological matters, and secures a type of religion to correspond—genial, cultured, and inexigent. And there are those among ourselves who are not willing to be outdone by any church in such comprehension. But such a conception of freedom is entirely different from the idea of it that lies at the root of the free-church case. It should be made clear that free thought, if a real, is yet a secondary and sequacious interest from the free-church point of view. It has already been shown that the free churches, as they were born in England, are redolent of that moral and practical soil. They did not arise either in the theology or in the philosophy of the schools. They do not savour of academic liberty. They do not cultivate liberty for academic completeness but for evangelical fullness, for the freed conscience, for practical experience and action. Neither theology nor philosophy is, in itself, an English interest, and it was the English genius that went into the free churches. They are intensely national in their spiritual features, especially as regards local and individual liberty in Christ. They arose out of the interest of practical life—the life of the local church on the one hand and the experient soul on the other. They arose in the interest of the soul's liberty with God, and not the mind's liberty in the world, the interest of moral and evangelical liberty, not of intellectual, except as that is promoted and demanded by the other, and as a soul set free in God is free to range and realise His creation. Their congenial freedom is therefore freedom of faith rather than of thought. They rest on that freedom in God and His righteousness to which all other freedom is duly added.

But we may stop to urge here that it is added. Man's first concern is that God should be free, his second is that he should be free before God; it is only thus, in the third place, that the freedom of his thought becomes a concern; whether its freedom from past thought or its freedom from its neighbour's. But then it does become an inevitable concern, as part of the freedom of his confession of God's liberty and God's redemption, whether in worship or in thought. It is part of his duty and service to the God of liberty and truth. It is a concern, therefore, with a double foundation. Our freedom of thought or worship rests on two pillars. First, it rests on an evangelical basis—on God's free will of grace in His revelation of Himself by His liberating Gospel. And, second, it rests on a historic basis, on the mental evolution which has been already traversed in the Church as the field of that gospel's expanding truth. We must continue the great enlarging tradition of Christian thought—the greatest in the world. This means that the truth of the past is an essential condition, and even an ingredient, in the truth of the present; and that orthodoxy is rationally treated not when it is dissolved and rejected, but only when it is understood, interpreted, and developed.

But our chief concern is with the former base, that of ultimate truth in God's final revelation of Himself, where not only our last reality comes by our Liberator, but He is Himself our only freedom. If we have not the warrant of our religious freedom there, we have it nowhere. As churches we are entitled only to such freedom as that inspires, demands, or implies. With the instinct of natural freedom we are not directly concerned. That is a matter of civil or academic interest. But our freedom of Christian thought is included. And I am anxious to point out the service that would be rendered to freedom of view and fulness of thought when the Church is clear and explicit about the one article of its positive and liberating gospel. Thought in the Church is hampered, first, for want of a single dynamic centre which does for the race what personality does for the individual, and at once inspires and co-ordinates all our thinking, so that it is the Spirit thinking in us. And then the thinkers themselves are hampered by an honourable concern lest in freely following and uttering their thought they should be committing their brethren, impairing their freedom, and forcing their consciences; or lest they should be enjoying a position which is only given them by beliefs they renounce, and taking advantage of resources they obtained only by profession of what they now discard. It is impossible for thought to act freely and beneficially under such conditions as the absence of a creative foundation on the one hand, and an inexpugnable footing of right on the other. But were the Church to offer to its own explorers as well as to the world a clear, brief, and positive confession (evangelical and not theological, declared and not subscribed) of its one creative Gospel whose nature is to quicken the whole man and his thought, to quicken him to life and not trim him to type—how much would be gained for liberty! The precise form of such a declaration would be matter of discussion. The form offered by Dr. Denney might be taken; or such a form as 2 Cor. v. 19, 21, if Scripture words were desired; or such a version of it as that God was in Christ forgiving and reconciling the world by a new creation in the person and cross of Jesus Christ, His only Son, our living Lord. Whatever the form might be it would give the Church its true moral basis and its only ground, firm amid the swamps of sentiment and the blasts of criticism. And it would not only allow but invite all critical freedom that did not take the life of that generous gospel which inspires the matter and passion of freedom. The two great departments of interest which engross modern thought, and demand the re-casting of much we inherit, are those that surround the science of criticism on the one hand and the philosophy of immanence on the other. Both are Protestant features, not to say products. And such a declaration would give liberty and protection in the Church to all competent criticism of the Bible or of theology which did not dissolve the saving Christ; and it would protect all the schooled philosophy of immanence which did justice to the intimacy of God in His world, but did not lose Him in a Monism which is rather the absolutising of the immanent than the incarnation of the transcendent.

In regard to Independency in particular, it may be pointed out that, as the union of the free churches becomes a more real thing, some such share in a public statement of terms of communion may become a necessity. Otherwise Independency may be left behind, and relapse into the isolated sectarianism against which its genius has always protested; and it may do so, not for the sake of the Gospel, but for the sake of an unchartered freedom which it would then not draw from the Gospel, but prefer to it.

And it may farther be remembered that the valuable spiritualist tendencies whose timely absorption saved Independency for its great work at the first will always be asserting themselves in a communion so free; and they will always require such a steadying and such a corrective as can be given to Christians only by a rally upon their one positive and creative base. A declaratory certainty is, more even than liberty, not only the present need but the vital tradition and genius of the Independent Churches, for the sake both of their footing and their freedom. And especially as they realise what was in their first stand. Baillie, in his Dissuasive from the Errors of the Time, and especially of the Independents, says the independence of the congregation from presbytery or synod "was thought to be their proper distinctive and characteristical tenet, till of late we find them passionately reject the name Independents, and tell us that the dependency or independency of Congregationalism will be found to be one of their least differences and smallest controversies." Independency was but a means to secure the better their great principle of evangelical prophetism, the free confession of a historic and individual salvation as a faith and not a theology. It was, therefore, as the Presbyterians did not see, the trustee of things hidden or hated in the rest of Protestantism, those religious and social ideas, so rich for public life in Church and State, which, being rooted in the faith and inspiration of a positive gospel made the Reformation Dissenters the wellhead of future liberty and progress. The polity, or 'apolity,' was there as a convenience for that gospel. Its freedom was there only to serve that freedom. It was not there for the sake of an abstract idea of liberty in ecclesiastical things, or to give scope to an unchartered freedom. It was not even there to reproduce the Church government of the New Testament. It was there only for the sake of the positive liberty that is in Christ, and in a Christ whose release of us was evangelical or nothing. It was there to give the utmost effect possible in Church and State to something which was more precious than all the liberty of the world because it was the source of it, namely, the active will of God for the world's salvation through a forgiving redemption in the cross of Jesus Christ. Independency stood for the Gospel not as a limitation on liberty, but as its creative source.

The more spiritual any historic movement is, i.e. the more dependent on revelation, so much the more it must return always to its classic source to adjust its compass, and to realise its genius and its call. And the more spiritual it is the more also it will be found to have its classic and normative time at its source. Its principle is in its creation, like human freedom; which, being given by God, was given for God. The more spiritual it is the more is it of positive inspiration. And the inspiration of historic religions is chiefly with their founders or their foundation. It is at their creative head. The case is otherwise with movements which are but evolutionary. There the process works up from beneath instead of down from above. We have then to do with a mere development and not a revelation. So that we may find the law or principle in the finished product more clearly and powerfully than at the point of origin. And were Christianity but the index instead of the cause of man's spiritual evolution we should properly look for its normative principle in the latest developments of the Christian conscience—if we did not have to wait for it till the end of history. But it is not so that we learn Christ. He is not a great step in a greater process, not the hand at the sluice which releases a greater power than it possesses; but He is Himself the fountainhead of all that religion can ever be for man and his soul. He is our freedom who is our new Creator. It is to Him, therefore, and to the apostles He chose and inspired for His self-revelation, that the Church they created must always return for the standard, as for the power, whereby it is to go on and minister to each age as it arrives.

If it is so with the whole Church, it is so also with each great movement within the Church itself which recalls it to its true mission and genius. In developing such movements we must, in proportion as they are spiritual, profound, and regal for an age—we must return to their first spring, and to the apostolic men in whom they rose to power and effect. There we have the principle in its true purity and force. There it was most deeply and clearly grasped. It was bound to be so if it was to break through the frozen life, crusted prejudices, and iron orthodoxies round its source. The days of its creation are the days that contain the principle of its progress most richly, and mightily, and permanently. This was so in the Reformation. It is in the few first years of that renaissance of the new birth that we find its principle in its purity; when it flushed souls like a flame of fire in Luther, or a great smooth stream in Melancthon; and before there resurged upon it the interests, the policies, and the scholasticisms which in a century had damped it to a smouldering mass, or clad it in a cumbrous mail.

And so it also is in the case of that Independency which, seizing and developing the core of the Reformation, seized and carried forward also, and still more purely, the principle of that gospel which the Reformation disentombed. It is to its Messiahs and apostles, not its forerunners, that we must recur for its true principle and gospel—not to its John Baptist, Robert Browne, not to the Anabaptist and ultra-spiritualistic tendencies which seethed with other elements in the cauldron of our first flux. But we go to those who disengaged the principle clearly and effectively from its alloys (so useful at a stage), and made it not only face but rule the hour in its true consciousness of itself. To Robinson, to Cromwell, to

Milton, to Goodwin, and their peers—it is to such men, with a horizon and a lift in their thought, that we must go—not to the dogmatists of a later time, who burdened us with the debased Calvinism of the eighteenth century, and who had lost the great sense of our place in the whole Church and the whole history of the founded freedom of the West. And when we so do, when we turn to these classics, we shall find that our genius may perhaps be fitly expressed in these two words that have just fallen from my lips—FOUNDED FREEDOM. Not freedom alone is our genius; for freedom alone is but caprice, atomism, and anarchy in the end. But it is freedom created and founded and reared by an authority which cannot be either evaded or shaken; and which creates our emancipation, in the very depth and crisis of our soul, by the eternal redemption at the heart of all history in Christ's cross. It is our genius not simply to have set afloat on the practical world the re-creative principle of freedom and self-rule, political, social, and religious; but still more to have kept that principle in the closest dependence on another, which is creative as God is, and which is the principle of His new creation of us in Jesus Christ. It is to have preached and practised the foundation of all liberty of thought or action, public or private, in the evangelical freedom with which Christ's cross makes free the world and the soul. That organic union of positivity and liberty of Christian certainty and public freedom, in Church and State, is our genius and our trust. We have printed it on the free State; has our victory exhausted us of our power to commend it to a free Church? Are we too genial to be a power? more in love with liberty than sure of the one last condition which creates it? Are we amateurs of freedom rather than adepts of grace, a synagogue of the Libertines rather than a temple of the Holy Ghost?

We have a great tradition and a greater gospel. And the age has a great promise and a great need. It is a moral gospel and a moral need. They must meet in freedom. And we have much to do in the re-union.

Note to page 314.—Though if one were writing a complete estimate of Independency and its work, one would have to trace a considerable influence in the way of enlarging the independence of the single church within the great connectional bodies.

DECLARATION OF THE FAITH, CHURCH ORDER, AND DISCIPLINE OF THE CONGREGATIONAL, OR INDEPENDENT DISSENTERS, ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION, MAY, 1833.

PRINTED IN THE FIRST YEAR BOOK, 1846

THE CONGREGATIONAL Churches in England and Wales, frequently called INDEPENDENT, hold the following doctrines, as of Divine authority, and as the foundation of Christian faith and practice. They are also formed and governed according to the principles hereinafter stated.

PRELIMINARY NOTES.

1. It is not designed, in the following summary, to do more than to state the leading doctrines of faith and order maintained by Congregational Churches in general.
2. It is not proposed to offer any proofs, reasons, or arguments, in support of the doctrines herein stated, but simply to declare what the Denomination believes to be taught by the pen of inspiration.
3. It is not intended to present a scholastic or critical confession of faith, but merely such a statement as any intelligent member of the body might offer, as containing its leading principles.

4. It is not intended that the following statement should be put forth with any authority, or as a standard to which assent should be required.

5. Disallowing the utility of creeds and articles of religion as a bond of union, and protesting against subscription to any human formularies as a term of communion, Congregationalists are yet willing to declare, for general information, what is commonly believed among them, reserving to every one the most perfect liberty of conscience.

6. Upon some minor points of doctrine and practice, they, differing among themselves, allow to each other the right to form an unbiassed judgment of the Word of God.

7. They wish it to be observed, that, notwithstanding their jealousy of subscription to creeds and articles, and their disapproval of the imposition of any human standard, whether of faith or discipline, they are far more agreed in their doctrines and practices than any Church which enjoins subscription and enforces a human standard of orthodoxy; and they believe that there is no minister and no church among them that would deny the substance of any one of the following doctrines of religion, though each might prefer to state his sentiments in his own way.

PRINCIPLES OF RELIGION.

I. The Scriptures of the Old Testament, as received by the Jews, and the books of the New Testament, as received by the Primitive Christians from the Evangelists and Apostles, Congregational Churches believe to be Divinely inspired, and of supreme authority. These writings, in the languages in which they were originally composed, are to be consulted, with the aids of sound criticism, as a final appeal to all controversies, but the common version they consider to be adequate to the ordinary purposes of Christian instruction and edification.

II. They believe in one God, essentially wise, holy, just, and good; eternal, infinite, and immutable in all natural and moral perfections; the Creator, Supporter, and Governor of all beings, and of all things.

III. They believe that God is revealed in the Scriptures, as the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and that to each are attributable the same Divine properties and perfections. The doctrine of the Divine existence, as above stated, they cordially believe, without attempting fully to explain.

IV. They believe that man was created after the Divine image, sinless, and, in his kind, perfect.

V. They believe that the first man disobeyed the Divine command, fell from his state of innocence and purity, and involved all his posterity in the consequences of that fall.

VI. They believe that, therefore, all mankind are born in sin, and that a fatal inclination to moral evil, utterly incurable by human means, is inherent in every descendant of Adam.

VII. They believe that God having, before the foundation of the world, designed to redeem fallen man, made disclosures of His mercy, which were the grounds of faith and hope from the earliest ages.

VIII. They believe that God revealed more fully to Abraham the covenant of His grace, and, having promised that from his descendants should arise the Deliverer and Redeemer of mankind, set that patriarch and his posterity apart, as a race specially favoured and separated to His service ; a peculiar church, formed and carefully preserved, under the Divine sanction and government, until the birth of the promised Messiah.

IX. They believe that, in the fulness of the time, the Son of God was manifested in the flesh, being born of the Virgin Mary, but conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit ; and that our Lord Jesus Christ was both the Son of man and the Son of God ; partaking fully and truly of human nature though without sin—equal with the Father and “ the express image of His person.”

X. They believe that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, revealed, either personally in His own ministry, or by the Holy Spirit in the ministry of His apostles, the whole mind of God, for our salvation ; and that, by His obedience to the Divine law while He lived, and by His sufferings unto death, He meritoriously “ obtained eternal redemption for us ” ; having thereby vindicated and illustrated Divine justice, “ magnified the law,” and “ brought in everlasting righteousness.”

XI. They believe that, after His death and resurrection, He ascended up into heaven, where, as the Mediator, He “ ever liveth ” to rule over all, and to “ make intercession for them that come unto God by Him.”

XII. They believe that the Holy Spirit is given, in consequence of Christ’s mediation, to quicken and renew the hearts of men ; and that His influence is indispensably necessary to bring a sinner to true repentance, to produce saving faith, to regenerate the heart, and to perfect our sanctification.

XIII. They believe that we are justified through faith in Christ, as “ the Lord our righteousness,” and not “ by the works of the law.”

XIV. They believe that all who will be saved were the objects of God’s eternal and electing love, and were given by an act of Divine sovereignty to the Son of God ; which in no way interferes with the system of means, nor with the grounds of human responsibility ; being wholly unrevealed as to its objects, and not a rule of human duty.

XV. They believe that the Scriptures teach the final perseverance of all true believers to a state of eternal blessedness, which they are appointed to obtain through constant faith in Christ and uniform obedience to His commands.

XVI. They believe that a holy life will be the necessary effect of a true faith and that good works are the certain fruits of a vital union to Christ.

XVII. They believe that the sanctification of true Christians, or their growth in the graces of the Spirit, and meetness for heaven, is gradually carried on through the whole period during which it pleases God to continue them in the present life, and that, at death, their souls, perfectly freed from all remains of evil, are immediately received into the presence of Christ.

XVIII. They believe in the perpetual obligation of Baptism and the Lord’s Supper ; the former to be administered to all converts to Christianity and their children, by the application of water to the subject, “ in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost ” ; and the latter to be celebrated by Christian churches as a token of faith in the Saviour, and of brotherly love.

XIX. They believe that Christ will finally come to judge the whole human race according to their works ; that the bodies of the dead will be raised again ; and that, as the Supreme Judge,

He will divide the righteous from the wicked, will receive the righteous into "life everlasting," but send away the wicked into "everlasting punishment."

XX. They believe that Jesus Christ directed His followers to live together in Christian fellowship, and to maintain the communion of saints; and that, for this purpose, they are jointly to observe all Divine ordinances, and maintain that church order and discipline which is either expressly enjoined by inspired institution, or sanctioned by the undoubted example of the apostles and of apostolic churches.

PRINCIPLES OF CHURCH ORDER AND DISCIPLINE.

I. The Congregational Churches hold it to be the will of Christ that true believers should voluntarily assemble together to observe religious ordinances, to promote mutual edification and holiness, to perpetuate and propagate the Gospel in the world, and to advance the glory and worship of God, through Jesus Christ; and that each society of believers, having these objects in view in its formation, is properly a Christian church.

II. They believe that the New Testament contains, either in the form of express statute, or in the example and practice of apostles and apostolic churches, all the articles of faith necessary to be believed, and all the principles of order and discipline requisite for constituting and governing Christian societies; and that human traditions, fathers and councils, canons and creeds, possess no authority over the faith and practice of Christians.

III. They acknowledge Christ as the only Head of the Church, and the officers of each church under Him, as ordained to administer His laws impartially to all; and their only appeal, in all questions touching their religious faith and practice, is to the sacred Scriptures.

IV. They believe that the New Testament authorises every Christian church to elect its own officers, to manage all its own affairs, and to stand independent of, and irresponsible to, all authority, saving that only of the Supreme and Divine Head of the Church, the Lord Jesus Christ.

V. They believe that the only officers placed by the apostles over individual churches are the bishops or pastors and the deacons; the number of these being dependent upon the number of the church; and that to these, as the officers of the church, is committed respectively the administration of its spiritual and temporal concerns—subject, however, to the approbation of the church.

VI. They believe that no persons should be received as members of Christian churches, but such as make a credible profession of Christianity, are living according to its precepts, and attest a willingness to be subject to its discipline, and that none should be excluded from the fellowship of the church, but such as deny the faith of Christ, violate His laws, or refuse to submit themselves to the discipline which the Word of God enforces.

VII. The power of admission into any Christian church, and rejection from it, they believe to be vested in the church itself, and to be exercised only through the medium of its own officers.

VIII. They believe that Christian churches should stately meet for the celebration of public worship, for the observance of the Lord's Supper and for the sanctification of the first day of the week.
